Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be no question that there is authority of law directing the Commissioner of Agriculture to adopt regulations and rules for the quarantining of animals and to prevent the spread of disease by the treatment of animals through quarantine methods. But no one has yet pointed out any statute which gives the power to the Commissioner of Agriculture to take the property itself, namely, the animals.

Mr. TAWNEY. By purchase?

Mr. CARLIN. Either by purchase or otherwise, unless we find it in the appropriation act. There is no statute which permits the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase animals for any purpose, either to maintain them or to destroy them. And the only law by which it could be justified would be the appropriation bill which is now pending. If he has the right to purchase, then it would be unnecessary to add the right to destroy.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all.

Mr. CARLIN. Under his own rules and regulations he could destroy it when it became his own property.

Mr. TAWNEY. It would not become the property of the Secretary, but the property of the United States, and he could not destroy the property of the United States without authority of law.

Mr. CARLIN. If your construction be correct, he would have the right, under quarantine regulations, to purchase the property, and then, under his own quarantine, if necessary to stop the spread of the disease, to destroy the property.

Mr. TAWNEY. That may be true.

Mr. CARLIN. There is no statute that permits him to purchase the animal for any purpose, either to maintain it, quarantine it, or destroy it. He can quarantine it without destruction.

Mr. TAWNEY. If his regulations authorize him to destroy it, that would have the force and effect of law, provided it does not controvert the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the chairman of the committee and will ask for the authority of the Commissioner of Agriculture to purchase and destroy diseased cattle.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the language of the act creating the Department of Agriculture is extremely broad. It authorizes the Secretary in terms to practically do everything that may be necessary in his judgment for the promotion of agriculture, and undoubtedly the extirpation of dangerous and contagious diseases among domestic animals would be a work in the promotion of agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman cite the paragraph in the law creating the Department of Agriculture that has within it the scope that he refers to?

Mr. SCOTT. I cite the first section of the compilation, which I think the Chair has, as follows:

> There shall be at the seat of Government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants.

Passing from that, I will call the attention of the Chair to the lines of section 2, on page 99, to which I think I referred, making it the duty of the agents of the Secretary to provide against the spread of dangerous, contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases, and I would like to have that read in connection with the language of section 3 immediately following where authority is expressly given and it is declared to be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the authority there given him to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary inevitably carries with it the authority to carry those rules and regulations into effect, and therefore I hold that if the Secretary reaches a conclusion that it is necessary in order to carry out the provisions of the act to purchase and destroy any given animals this section gives him the authority to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I was going to put it in the form of a question to the gentleman from Kansas, the chairman of the committee. If his theory be right, that the broad language of the statute he has read gives this authority to purchase and destroy, as specified in the bill, then it strikes me, to carry it out to the logical conclusion, it would fall of its own weight. Suppose that a man who owned the diseased cattle said: "I will not sell." Then the Secretary of Agriculture, under the gentleman's own bill, would be absolutely helpless. There is no law to compel the owner to sell. He can not be compelled to sell; the Secretary can not buy the cattle.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in response to that I wish to say that the Secretary has other resources at his command which might practically compel the owner of the diseased cattle to sell them. The Secretary could say to the owner: "Very well; if you refuse to sell and will not allow me to destroy your cattle, I will put a quarantine around your farm, and you can not move them," and then I presume he would be willing to sell.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; and it seems to me that without this language in the bill the Secretary would still have that authority. He could say to the man if this were stricken out, "I can quarantine your cattle and prevent their shipment," and bring the man to terms the same as he could in the other way, exactly. That would still remain there. But when you come to a concrete proposition in the language of the bill, which says that he shall have the right to purchase and destroy, is one which gives relief to the owner, it may be one that will give relief under the law, but does not, as I look at it, Mr. Chairman, give any relief whatever. The man still has the right to stand on his rights, if you concede all the chairman said, and say, "You may quarantine and build a Chinese wall around my farm; nevertheless I will not sell," and he can not be compelled to; hence it seems to me an illogical clause, and therefore I think that the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Nebraska that merely because it might be possible to defeat the purpose sought to be accomplished does not mean that the Secretary has not been given a certain power. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to section 2 of the act of May 29, 1884, on page 99. If that section be read, it seems to me there can be no doubt as to the right of the Secretary even to purchase and destroy these animals.

Section 2 provides that the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents "whose duties shall be" to do certain things. They are authorized under the instructions of the commissioner "to examine and report" upon certain things, "and whose duty shall be," if the Chair will repeat the language, "to provide against the spread of certain contagious diseases." If the Chair will eliminate that portion of the section which enumerates as part of their duties the examination and report, and will read it so as to see the exact powers given, "whose duty shall be to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases," the statute is much clearer. How can the Department of Agriculture provide against the spread of these contagious diseases, so as to effect in a practical way the prevention of the spread of contagious disease, if it be not to destroy the infected animal which has the disease and may communicate it?

Mr. NORRIS. I concede all that the gentleman says of the power there, but I insist that would still exist if these words were stricken out; that the right to purchase means nothing. That is legislation without any doubt. I do not deny the construction that the gentleman puts upon it, that the right to prevent the spread of a disease might include the right to go on and destroy, and then the payment of whatever of value was destroyed would follow as a matter of law; but to insist that the purchase of this stock is necessary in order to carry out that provision of the law it seems to me is illogical, and does not follow, because you can not make a man sell unless he wants to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Whether a man can be compelled to sell or not is immaterial. The question is whether the words "purchase and destroy" confer any additional authority upon the Secretary of Agriculture. I contend that it does not; that it is one of the means by which the Commissioner of Agriculture carries out the power vested in him under the statute. He is authorized, and his duty under the statute is, to provide against the spread of these contagious diseases. How shall he provide against them? In whatever way may be possible, and Congress may direct in one way or another. These words in the appropriation bill do not confer any additional authority upon him. This may be a limitation upon the extensive grant given to the commissioner to expend this money to prevent the spread of these diseases by purchasing and destroying cattle, and in no other way, unless in some other way authority is given to expend this particular money. So that instead of this being a new authorization of power to the department it is, in effect, a limitation upon this particular appropriation, since the Secretary can only expend this particular appropriation to provide against the spread of contagious and other infectious diseases in the manner authorized, and in no other manner. If the words were stricken out, then he might spend the money to prevent the spread of these diseases in any manner that he might deem proper.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 2 of the act which the gentleman has before him provides that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint certain agents, who are, among other things:

> To examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and examining animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppressin and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia.

Now they are to report to the Commissioner of Agriculture That is the duty of these agents, as the Chair reads the section so far. Does the gentleman from New York think up to this point they are authorized to purchase or destroy animals?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not under that language, no; but there is a comma after "pleuro-pneumonia."

The CHAIRMAN. It provides further:

> And to provide against the spread of other dangerous, contagious infectious, and communicable diseases.

That seems to exclude pleuro-pneumonia, but the language in this appropriation bill is:

> To purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals, or quarantine the same whenever in his judgment essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia—

And so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That might be true. I think the suggestion of the Chair is correct, and that perhaps the use of the word "pleuro-pneumonia" in the appropriation may be sufficient to destroy this provision on the point of order; but I was assuming that under the language of section 2 of the act of May, 1884, the duty of these commissioners is not only to report in the respects indicated, but it is also to provide against the spread of these other diseases. So far as these other diseases are concerned, there is no limitation upon their power, and it would be proper to construe this provision of the appropriation bill as a limitation upon their power, so as to compel them to exercise that power in this particular manner.

The CHAIRMAN. The statute clearly intended that there should be an investigation and report on the best manner of treating pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. SCOTT. What does the Chair think of the provision relating to rules and regulations in section 3 of the same statute?

The CHAIRMAN. Section 3 does not seem to the Chair to have a direct bearing upon the question now before the House, the authorization of the purchase and destruction of cattle with the disease of pleuro-pneumonia. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order as to that portion of the paragraph—that is, to the language beginning:

To purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals or quarantine the same whenever, in his judgment, essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another—

That being clearly no authorization of law for that part of the paragraph.

Mr. PERKINS. The striking out of those words makes my amendment unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Wholly so.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INTERNATIONAL FIELDS SPORTS EXPOSITION AT VIENNA.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, recommending that the sum of $50,000 be appropriated by the Congress to enable the United States to participate in the First International Sporting and Fields Sports Exposition, which will open at Vienna in May, 1910, to take part in which a cordial invitation to the United States was extended by the Government of Austria-Hungary.

For the purpose of such participation, my predecessor recommended an appropriation of $250,000, based on an estimate of exhibits which it would have been at that time possible to collect and prepare for the exposition. Inasmuch as the near approach of the time for the opening of the exposition does not now admit of an exhibit by the United States so elaborate and extensive as was at first contemplated, this amount is reduced by the Secretary of State to $50,000, and his recommendation that this sum be appropriated has my approval.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1910.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 29, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, has the Journal been approved?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SIMS. If the Journal has been approved, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I will read an editorial which appeared in the Nashville Banner, a newspaper published at Nashville, Tenn., in its issue of January 20, 1910, as follows:

ABUSE OF THE FRANK.

Congressman KORBLY, of Indiana, who recently sent nearly a carload of bags of seed to his constituents through the mails on his congressional frank, admits that he abused the franking privilege and that he opposes the continuance of such abuses; but he says that as long as they continue he intends to see that his share of government seeds are distributed. This is equivalent to saying that although he condemns the wrong he proposes to continue to do the wrong as long as the opportunity is afforded and other Members do it.

The franking privilege allowed Congressmen should be very greatly restricted and confined strictly to the transmission by mail of official business communications. The abuse of the privilege under the present laws, however, is chargeable to the Congressman himself. The law should be amended so as to remove the opportunities for abuse, and even without amendment the Members of Congress should get together and institute a reform as to their free use of the mails.

Mr. Speaker, the Nashville Banner is in no sense a sensational journal. It is not a yellow newspaper; it is not a muck-raking journal. It is a staid, conservative, and ably edited newspaper. Was this simply a communication written by some correspondent, I should take no notice of it; but inasmuch as it appears in the form of an editorial, having editorial indorsement, and in a way reflecting on every Member of the House, I think it but just that it should be noticed to some extent.

A few years ago, during the Fifty-ninth Congress, a similar editorial was published in a Washington newspaper charging that Members of Congress were franking about everything from a Jersey bull to a humming bird. [Laughter.] I introduced a resolution to have the charges investigated by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It was thoroughly investigated and a report made that there was nothing in the charge. Even the gentleman who wrote the article was summoned before the committee and testified that he knew not a single instance himself of abuse of the franking privilege.

The Postmaster-General, Mr. Cortelyou, in a report to the committee said:

I have the honor to inform you that there have been, from time to time, instances in which, as the law was construed by the department, franks have been improperly used, but so far as known the irregularities have been corrected promptly when attention has been drawn to them. There is no penalty for violation of the franking privilege.

Franked matter is ordinarily under seal, and therefore is not subject to scrutiny. The recipient of the matter, judging for himself, often alleges abuse when such may not be the fact. No doubt this circumstance accounts in a measure for some of the criticism on the subject.

A further paragraph from the report says:

There have been epochs in American journalism where the bias of partisan rancor was reflected in editorial utterances, but the editors of the past who have been illustrious in American journalism were conspicuous for their ability in the marshaling of facts, not in the manufacturing of facts.

Mr. Speaker, this Nashville paper does not believe in graft of any kind. It does believe in a proper administration and enforcement of the laws, National, State, and municipal. But for some reason, the editor of this paper has thought that the evil was so great as to justify the taking of his time and talents to appeal to Members of Congress to institute a reform society among themselves. I think the country is entitled to know something about the facts, because there is so much misrepresentation of the facts. I do not know what the gentleman from Indiana said, but I do not believe he said anything of this sort. The editorial says in effect that he franked a carload of seeds to his district.

In the first place, he is only entitled to 20,000 packages of vegetable and 2,000 packages of flower seeds. What is the weight of a carload? About 40,000 pounds. Think how small the weight of the seed that the gentleman was entitled to would be if all were sent at once. The weight of the whole allotment would not be 1 ton. If the whole were sent at once, is that an abuse of the franking privilege? Was not it really a favor to the postal authorities that all the seeds should be dumped into sacks and shipped at once rather than each package should be franked and separately handled? The gentleman from Indiana can speak for himself. Now, what is an abuse of the franking privilege? The word "abuse" has many meanings, but in this case can have but one, and that is unauthorized or misused—a perversion.

I will admit that a Member of Congress can abuse his franking privilege. He can write and place in a franked envelope matter that is not frankable, but nobody except those who receive that letter know the contents of it. The postal authorities could not by any sort of inspection discover it themselves. Recently, however, the Post-Office Department held, for some reason or other, that a Member of Congress could not send his addressed franks for seeds from the Office Building over here, less than a mile down to the Agricultural Department, under a frank. I will not question the correctness of that ruling. How do those franks get to us in bulk? Are they not sent to us either by the Agricultural Department or the Government Printing Office in bulk and under a frank of the department?

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not natural to expect some such statement as this, which the gentleman read from the newspapers of the country, and to expect it to go the rounds of the press just now when Congress is investigating with a view of legislating to compel publishers to pay some part of the cost of carrying magazines to their subscribers, instead of sending them at a cent a pound, and thereby getting what is called a subsidy? Does not the gentleman expect some such attacks as this naturally, while that thing is going on and an investigation is being made?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, that is a very pertinent inquiry, and something about which I was going to speak if the gentleman had not asked me, but I am very glad that he did ask me. Now, what is frank? It means free. The last report of the Postmaster-General says that the expense to the Government for free mail last year under congressional frank was $518,385, and for free mail under "penalty" envelopes—that is, departmental—was $5,219,661. That includes government franks not used by Members of Congress—it is ten times as great as that used by Members of the House and the Senate. What else do we find?

The Postmaster-General in his report and the President of the United States in his message to this body said that the cost to the Government for carrying second-class matter, over and above what was paid for it, was $64,128,026. The entire expense to the Government for sending franked matter of all kinds that can be described as congressional was $518,385, and of sending newspapers and periodicals, $64,128,026. If this report is true, if the President's message is true—and I am not here to say that it is or is not, but it ought to at least be treated as prima facie true—then the newspapers and the periodicals, those who have the benefit of the second-class rates, receive by way of franking privilege as much in one year as Congress does in one hundred and twenty years. [Applause.] What do you think of that, when they set themselves up to say that Congressmen ought to organize a reform society among themselves? We find also from this report that in the registry division the loss to the Government was $3,878,000, or, in round numbers, eight times as much as the entire congressional frank. A registered letter or package is a letter or package carrying valuables of the sender, and yet the Government of the United States, if this report can be believed, is giving a franking privilege to those who register their mail of $4,000,000, speaking in round numbers. What else is going on?

Understand, Mr. Speaker, that I am not saying that the Postmaster-General is correct in his report. Maybe he is incompetent, maybe he is unfit for his office, maybe he has deceived the President in presenting here a solemn statement in his recommendations to us that is not true. I will not say that Mr. Hitchcock can not deceive if he tries. We all know that as manager of the national Republican campaign last year he did deceive the majority of the people in this country into voting the Republican ticket. [Laughter.] Whether he has done it in his report is a question of fact; but if it can be shown that the facts he has reported are not true, our honorable newspaper friends should devote their time to showing that Mr. Hitchcock is the most colossal incompetent that has ever been put on the country, if he does not know the difference between 64,000,000 and 4,000,000, for the publishers claim that he is $60,000,000 out of the way.

Now, let us compare the annual appropriation bills with this deficit. The loss to the Government on second-class matter, including newspapers and periodicals, in one year exceeds the total sum of the following annual appropriation bills, and I speak only in round numbers: Agricultural, $12,900,000; diplomatic and consular, $3,000,000; legislative, $11,000,000; Military Academy, $2,000,000; rivers and harbors, last year, $9,000,000. The loss to the Government on second-class matter is exceeded only by four of the great annual appropriation bills. It is exceeded by the army and by the sundry civil, naval, and pensions, because, of course, the post-office appropriation bill should not be regarded, as it is met by the revenues from that department.

Now, these same gentlemen, or somebody, I do not know who, flooded this country and flooded the Members of this House with literature, and I want some of my friends in the rural districts to read a little of it. Here is the answer of the magazines and their demands. They no longer come in the form of petitioners, but with a big stick, demanding. Let me show you one of the things they say, you gentlemen who are interested in rural free delivery. The tendency of these statements is to charge upon the rural free delivery the deficit. They say the Postmaster-General does not know what he is doing when he reports the loss on second-class matter, but he does know what he is saying when he reports the loss on rural free delivery, because they set forth his figures for that loss, whereas they will not take him for the other. In one paragraph they say:

If the rural free-delivery system were discontinued to-morrow it would never be known to magazine publishers through any effect on their business.

Mr. Speaker, the truth is that upon the rural free-delivery service the greatest increase is in the second-class matter, including newspapers, periodicals, and magazines. The Postmaster-General shows that it cost $28,000,000 more to operate the rural free-delivery service last year than was received from it; therefore it costs five times as much to carry a newspaper or periodical upon a rural route than it does upon the ordinary mail routes of the country. Who is getting the benefit of that semifranking privilege? Why, every newspaper and pamphlet is counted as a piece of mail in determining whether the rural routes shall be continued or not, and we know that in order to maintain this service the subscription to papers and periodicals is stimulated by both carriers and patrons along those lines. Now, if it costs $8 to the Government, upon the average, to carry 100 pounds of second-class mail more than it gets out of it, or, rather, for every $9 the Government spends for carrying second-class mail it has a loss of $8, it costs five times more to serve the rural free delivery than it does on the general mail routes, and therefore every piece of second-class mail matter on rural routes costs forty times as much as the Government gets out of it.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. BARNHART. The President has announced that it costs 9 cents to transport second-class matter on a railroad. Is that right?

Mr. SIMS. That is the average of all mail carried on railroads or otherwise.

Mr. BARNHART. Express companies very frequently occupy one end of the same car that is used for carrying mail. I have a letter setting forth that the express companies will transport mail or expressage from here to Chicago, approximately 1,000 miles, for 2½ cents on 50 pounds or more. Now, the cost of cross-continent transportation for expressage is 5 cents. If the express companies can carry at a profit in one end of the car at 2½ cents from here to Chicago, why is it that the Government must pay the railroad 9 cents for carrying the same matter in the other end of the car.

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Speaker, I am not here to say whether that report is correct or incorrect. It is official. The gentleman's statement is not on all fours, because it costs 9 cents per pound upon the average to carry the mail that is carried not only between given points in this country, but mail to England, the Philippines, and Porto Rico, and everywhere.

Now, another matter I want to notice in connection with this which is pertinent——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit a question? Does the report of the Postmaster-General state the amount of revenue from postal revenues which is derived from the first-class matter?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Letter postage; how much is there?

Mr. SIMS. You mean the profit?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The profits on first-class mail were $53,674,194.62.

Mr. TAWNEY. Assuming that this report as to the deficit in second-class matter is correct, it would enable Congress to authorize 1-cent postage on first-class matter if the deficit on the second-class matter was made up as proposed?

Mr. SIMS. Assuming these figures to be correct, it seems that the answer could be but one way. I am not undertaking to say that these figures are correct, but our newspaper and magazine friends, and we have all got them (the man that has not been written up and skinned by a few of them does not know he exists), insist that there is a set-off in this way; that by reason of the increased circulation of newspapers and magazines there is a corresponding stimulation of first-class mail and that they should have the benefit of the profits on the first-class mail which they stimulate. If they know how to calculate that, I will be glad to give it to them.

Mr. GOULDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman whether his $500,000 cost of the franking privilege means that it applies only to the Senate and House of Representatives, speaking in round figures?

Mr. SIMS. Free congressional franks.

Mr. GOULDEN. Can the gentleman tell us how much the cost to the Government of the franking privilege, or the free mail service, is to the Government itself?

Mr. SIMS. Five million two hundred and nineteen thousand six hundred and sixty-one dollars and sixty-five cents.

Mr. GOULDEN. Thank you.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe if there is a loss in the second-class postal rates the people are the real beneficiaries of the loss?

Mr. SIMS. That is a question every man can judge for himself. I am not here fighting to prevent the newspapers and magazines from having this privilege. I am here, though, objecting as one Member of this House to a continual stream of misrepresentation, slander, and abuse of Members of the House, with no facts for a basis for such charges.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. SIMS. Now, as to the franking privilege on seeds, let me tell you what is the present appropriation for seeds this year. It is the largest we have ever had, as I understand it. It is $265,000. The loss on second-class matter in one year would pay the total seed appropriation for two hundred and forty years, speaking in round numbers.

Now, as to the stimulus of first-class mail by the use of the seed frank, I will give you an almost pathetic example of it in a moment or two. Why, if we were to do as the Nashville Banner says, restrict the franking privilege exclusively to official business correspondence, then not a farmer's bulletin would be sent out, not an agricultural yearbook could be sent out, not a package of seed could be sent out, not a document from the document room could be sent out, unless the Member pay the postage out of his own pocket. What do you think about such an idea as that? It simply means, if carried out, that there would be none of these things sent out. Let the Members of this House who live in the rural districts think of your experience. You know very well that the sending out of seeds stimulates and is the direct cause of a flood of first-class mail matter. Is it not true? I have received as high as 50 letters and postal cards in one day from my district, requesting seeds. Therefore, if you are going to charge the Government with the loss of the franking of seeds, you should credit it with the first-class postal receipts growing directly out of it. I am confident, as far as my own district is concerned, and I can only speak of that—it being an agricultural district—that I receive within a year as many letters and postal cards from it relative to seeds as would equal the number of packages of seeds sent out. Many hundreds of people write for them and many hundreds write and acknowledge the receipt of them, and also write a statement as to the kind or quality of vegetables which were grown from the seeds. On all this mail the Government realizes a profit of 200 per cent, as I am informed, and not one cent of this revenue would be received by the Government if no seeds were sent out.

But here is my esteemed colleague, General GORDON, good, old confederate soldier, out of his goodness and kindness of heart, had a little statement published in the press in his district that anybody that wanted seeds to please write him. They took him at his word and they have written him, and so my colleague, the good, old general, came to me a few days ago and asked me if I knew where he could get some extra help to answer his mail that came to him from Mississippi, Arkansas, and Tennessee, asking him for seeds. [Laughter.] What a stimulus to first-class matter did arise out of that. The idea contained in such editorials as I have read that the franking privilege is for the private, personal benefit of the Member of Congress is ridiculous. You know, and I know, that we are continually being written to by the Department of Agriculture to get our franks addressed and get them to the department as soon as possible. They begin in the Southern States in December, I believe, and go on farther north. They write and ask us: "Do you want your franks; we will send them to you; we will have them sent to you." They have been sent to us, and now the Agricultural Department is sending to the Office Building and taking these frank slips down to the department at the Government's expense. What is the difference in effect, moral or otherwise, in going through the post-office at government expense or being hauled down to the Department of Agriculture at government expense?

Oh, I have seen in the newspapers, "Congressmen caught red-handed franking their seed franks," when everybody has been pursuing that practice ever since I have been here for thirteen years and nobody ever dreamed of it being wrong. Wherein is the Member benefited whether the Post-Office Department or the Agricultural Department takes them to the Department of Agriculture?

Now, a Member can abuse the franking privilege. He can write something and put it in a franked envelope and seal it, and nobody is going to find out anything about it except himself and the receiver. He can abuse the franking privilege in this way. But would he risk such a thing for 2 cents, to save the 2 cents that he would have to spend to stamp the letter? Such a letter might get out in the hands of his opponent or the friends of his opponent, and he would be charged with abusing the franking privilege, all on account of 2 cents. I know that such letters can get inadvertently in the mail once in a while. Once when I was a candidate for nomination a gentleman got hold of an envelope that I had written to somebody. It had the frank stamped on the corner. He was telling it around privately that I was violating the franking privilege. I got a friend to go and see the envelope, and he came back and said, "It is right; he has got the envelope; the letter was a private letter. I am very sorry." I said to him, "Was there not a stamp on it?" He answered, "Oh, yes, there was a stamp on the envelope; but it is against the law to send a private letter in a franked envelope even with a stamp on it." [Laughter.] But here are editors of great conservative newspapers, sitting down and working their brains to the highest pressure for the public good, and so intending at the time, without being muckrakers, sending out statements that are so far from the real facts of the case.

Now, I want to call attention to another matter. Our official characters are involved. Who has any respect for a man who would assassinate private character? Where is the newspaper that will publish scurrilous remarks about private individuals? Nowhere. But, my friends, the value of private character pales into insignificance compared with official character. If the instrumentalities of this Republic are unworthy of confidence, then the Republic is a failure. Often an attack upon a Member of Congress is made as soon as he gets here, who bore the best of reputation at home, and never bore anything else until he came here, simply on an unfounded, untrue, and false statement that he was franking something which he had no right to do. Where does your franked matter start from? It starts from the Washington post-office. The postmaster and the Post-Office Department here are not ignorant as to what is frankable matter.

The only matter that can go through the mails for your constituents that would not be subject to detection is sealed matter. It is true that a country postmaster seeing a Congressman's frank on a box or book would conclude it was frankable and send it out. No such thing is true of the post-office here. All your documents go through the Washington post-office, where they have expert knowledge as to whether the law is being violated. I have no objection to criticism. That is all right. I have no objection to Members who have violated the law being shown up; but do not libel a whole class for the wrongs of a single Member.

Now, I do not know whether the transportation of those 61 bags of seeds from Washington to Indianapolis cost the Government one cent or not. It all depends on whether they were sent during what is called "one of the weighing periods." The country, for the purpose of weighing the mails, is divided into four sections, and in each section the weighing period is 105 days every four years. If these 61 bags of seed were sent out at a time when no weighing was going on in that particular section, the railroads would get nothing for the transportation of those bags of seed. Seeds are only sent out in the winter and spring. All the weighing periods are not in the winter and spring, and therefore in all probability much of the seed and other frankable matter is carried by the railroads under their contracts with the Govenment without one cent of expense to the Government, because of not being sent at the time the weighing is done. Our newspaper friends do not seem to think about that or look into it. They certainly know or have the means of knowing if they wish.

I wish to read a letter from a man in my district just received:

MADOLE & BOERNER,
Paris, Tenn., January 21, 1910.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We understand that the postal rate on newspapers and periodicals of general circulation is likely to be increased very much, which will be very burdensome to the public at large and will have a tendency to cut off very much of the very best general reading now so easy to have. It seems the object of this increase is to make up the postal deficit. Now, we are opposed to making the people bear this imposition, as it is nothing else, in face of facts that somebody in your position should call attention to.

For instance: The average rate the railroads charge the Government per pound for a given distance for hauling mail is 9 cents per pound, and for doing this same service for the express companies they charge only 1 cent per pound. Can any good and valid reason be given why the people should have to pay nine times as much as the express companies for same service? Turn your guns on something like this and let the people alone. This Government, like all others, is bankrupt, and the above fact and a few more, that you could easily know, is the cause of every deficit everywhere. Don't tax the people any more; get after the other fellow.

Respectfully, yours, W. J. MADOLE.

Here is another letter on the same subject:

ATWOOD, TENN., January 23, 1910.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Noticing President Taft's recommendation to this Congress—a raise of three or four times its present rate on newspapers and periodicals of general circulation. This, especially to wipe out this post-office deficit, is absurd, and, as a Member of Congress, you know it, and the people that voted you to the place you now occupy know it. If President Taft would recommend to Congress, and our Congressmen would put it into law, to stop paying the railroads so many times above a fair remuneration for hauling these mails, there wouldn't be a deficit for Mr. Taft to howl over. Now, Mr. SIMS, I know your aspirations, and a vast army of your constituents know and are well informed on this measure as to their general good and welfare and as to where the difference in the present price and the annexed price will have to come from, so will advise you to give your whole time and strength in opposition to this bill, which is now before a committee of 19 on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Mr. JOHN A. MOON of Tennessee is a member of this committee. I also advise you to see Mr. MOON and use your influence on him against this bill. The people are becoming very much aroused on this, and if your aspirations are such as I think, it would pay you to act somewhat as to my advisability.

Very respectfully, BEN. B. JONES,
Rural Free Delivery, No. 1.

I have received others which I will not read, which are of the same tenor.

I have risen only for the purpose of disabusing the minds of people who may be misinformed with reference to the franking privilege and its cost. Incidentally I referred to the other, because, while I do not know whether Postmaster-General Hitchcock is correct or not, he is a sworn official of the Government, a member of the Cabinet, trusted by the President of the United States to the extent not only of appointing him to the office of Postmaster-General, but of sending to this House his message based upon his report of the operations of his department. If it is false, let my friends on the other side show it up. We poor Democrats have been out in the cold for thirteen long years, and have not even had an opportunity to look into the books. If you on the other side who have been running the Post-Office Department for all this time do not know what it is costing the country and what items constitute that cost, it shows your incapacity to remain in power any longer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am afraid that this recommendation of the President will result simply in having a commission appointed to investigate Mr. Hitchcock's figures, and that will do to get it beyond this Congress and another election, and perhaps by that time there will be somebody in power that will be more accurate about the figures. But if these figures are true, I appeal to your manhood as public servants to do your duty or quit the service. [Applause.]

PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 615):

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I beg to transmit herewith a report made to me by the Secretary of War upon the conditions found by him to exist in the island of Porto Rico during a visit made at my reqeust. The people of Porto Rico, if we may judge by the expressions of the political parties in the island, have been anxious to secure amendments to the so-called "Foraker law," and especially a declaration by Congress making those who are now Porto Rican citizens under the Foraker law American citizens.

I commend to Congress the consideration of the report of the Secretary of War and recommend the adoption of his suggestions, which have been embodied in a bill amending the so-called "Foraker Act." This bill is at the disposition of Congress. The Secretary suggests not an act making all Porto Rican citizens American citizens with or without their consent, but an act to provide machinery by which Porto Rican citizens who shall make the proper application for citizenship to a proper court shall become American citizens upon taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. After a certain date the right to vote and to hold office is to be confined to American citizens, and only those American citizens are to enjoy the franchise who can satisfy certain educational or property qualifications. At present there is manhood suffrage in the island, and, as a very large percentage of the voters are unable to read or write, the electorate is not one which should be intrusted with the government. It is much better in the interests of the people of the island that the suffrage should be limited by an educational and property qualification.

I do not comment on the other changes in the law recommended by the Secretary, because he sufficiently discusses them, and his arguments need no addition from me.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1910.

The message, with the accompanying document, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, with Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the reading of the bill, I would like unanimous consent for a few minutes to refer to matters concerning which questions were asked yesterday and to which complete answers could not then be given.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] inquired concerning the practice of the Bureau of Animal Industry, in relation to the matter of testing dips for sheep or cattle, desiring to know whether, in case loss of life of the animal resulted from such test, the owner was compensated by the bureau or the department. I referred that query to the chief of the bureau, Dr. A. D. Melvin, and have in my hand his reply, which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1910.

Hon. C. F. SCOTT,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SCOTT: Referring to the statement of Mr. BOOHER regarding the use of a certain dip at the South St. Joseph stock yards, I presume that the sheep he refers to are part of a large number which were required to be dipped on account of exposure to the disease known as "necrobacillosis," or lip and leg ulceration. This disease assumes both a malignant and benign form, and before sheep which have been a part of a diseased band are permitted to move into a section of the country where this disease does not exist it has been the practice to require that they be dipped in some antiseptic solution as one of the conditions for shipment. The dipping solution was furnished by the Stock Yard Company, for which a charge was made against the owner of the sheep. I do not know whether the seller or the purchaser pays this price to the Stock Yard Company at that market. This particular dip is known by the name of "Carsolium," and has been largely used in stronger proportion than heretofore for scab. The bureau did not designate this particular dip, but it was one of two classes of dips which were permitted used. Other dips permitted by the bureau have been found entirely harmless, and I understand they have since been installed by the Stock Yard Company at South St. Joseph. Sheep from unquarantined districts and which are not affected with or exposed to a contagious disease are not required to be dipped when the Stock Yard Company provide pens which are free of infection in which to handle such sheep. If the name of the owner of the sheep which Mr. BOOHER has in mind can be supplied, I presume the details regarding the dipping can be furnished you. The portion of the law quoted by Mr. BOOHER has no reference to the dipping of the sheep in question. Dips and similar substances are not tested under the provision of the law which refers to tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, or analogous products.

Very respectfully, A. D. MELVIN, Chief of Bureau.

I may summarize it briefly by saying that the department does make tests of different dips in order to determine their efficacy; and in case death results, it does not hold itself responsible for the loss, for the reason, I assume, that the experiments are never made except with the consent of the owner of the animals. In the case to which Doctor Melvin assumes that Mr. BOOHER refers, the statement he makes is that when sheep are already infected with disease and it is desired to ship them to some other part of the country, the law requires that they shall be disinfected by passing through the dip, and the work is done at the expense of the owner of the sheep or the commission man who handles them. In that case also the Government does not hold itself responsible for any loss that may ensue.

Mr. BOOHER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. BOOHER. Suppose the sheep are not diseased, but perfectly well and healthy, and the government experts, without the knowledge of the owner of the sheep, who is 25 miles away, dip them, and the sheep die. Is not that a different case?

Mr. SCOTT. I should think it would make a different case in equity and doubtless in law. Whether it makes a different case in practice I do not know. I assume, from Doctor Melvin's answer to the question whether or not the department ever bears the loss in such cases, that it would make no difference in practice.

Mr. BOOHER. Is not it a much more equitable case than where the government experts go out and buy tuberculous animals and pay for them? Here the animals are not diseased, and yet your bill carries an appropriation for the payment of tuberculous animals.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Not now.

Mr. BOOHER. But it did.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman's opinion is worth fully as much as mine. If the gentleman's facts present a different case, I presume it would be treated on a different basis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another question was asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], with a request that a copy of the contract between the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Weather Bureau be inserted in the RECORD. I hold in my hand quite a large volume, which is composed of contracts between the Department of Agriculture and the Western Union, the Postal Telegraph, several cable companies, and quite a large number of telephone companies. All of these contracts are of considerable length, and while I do not see the gentleman from Wisconsin on the floor, I assume that he would not care to have them published in the RECORD.

I will quote a line or two as evidence that the answers that I made to his question yesterday from memory were substantially correct:

Messages containing not more than 20 words, exclusive of the place from which it is sent and the date, 20 cents; each additional word, 1 cent, for all distances not exceeding 1,000 miles. Over 1,000 miles, one-quarter of a cent for every 500 miles or fractional part thereof.

Which is a rate, I think, of about one-third of the commercial rate.

A uniform rate of 12½ cents for a word, as agreed upon, for all Weather Bureau cablegrams transmitted between Washington and London, England, and 20 cents additional for every message not exceeding 20 words, and for each additional word, 1 cent.

Which, I take it, does not exceed one-half of the commercial rate.

But far the greater amount of telegraphing done by the Weather Bureau is by circuits; that is to say, a line running clear across the country will be connected with offices at different points in the country, and the operator at the station of each one of these places will take the message as it goes through, just as news dispatches are sent about the country.

For such reports the contract provides a rate of 2½ cents per word over each circuit not exceeding 1,000 miles in length, and having not more than four intermediate and two terminal stations, and one-half a cent a word additional for circuits over 1,000 miles in length. Inasmuch as the words sent on these circuits are invariably code words, one word being interpreted into five or six and sometimes ten or twelve words, it is apparent that the rate is a very low one. I think that will probably answer the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I will therefore ask that the reading of the bill proceed.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. I observe in this paragraph that has just been read a provision for extending the same inspection of meats now in force to "process butter factories," and providing for the marking of such packages, and so forth. Do I understand that that is where they use a process for working over or renovating old butter, and that it is the purpose to extend this inspection to that class of factories?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it is not an extension of the inspection in the sense that it is a new work. The duty of inspecting process butter factories was laid upon the Bureau of Animal Industry or upon the Agricultural Department by the oleomargarine act, passed in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and this language is simply carried in order that the appropriation for that purpose may be authorized.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Then, do I understand that the department has the right to say what kind of labels shall be placed on that kind of butter?

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly, according to the law.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. They now label it "process butter" instead of "renovated butter," do I understand?

Mr. SCOTT. I am not familiar with the labels on that commodity.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. And sell it as creamery butter?

Mr. SCOTT. I am not familiar with that fact, if it be a fact.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I am very glad that this provision is there, as, in my judgment, it will have a good effect.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the twenty-eight-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and the construction and alteration of buildings thereon, the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases, and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals, $623,000.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday by a ruling of the Chair, that portion of the preceding paragraph beginning in the middle of line 5 was stricken out. I would like to inquire of the chairman what effect that has on this total appropriation of $623,000.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think that any part of the appropriation of $623,000 could be safely omitted on account of the elimination of the language to which the gentleman refers, for the reason that, as a matter of fact, a very small part of this $623,000 is ordinarily used for the purpose provided in the language stricken out. The gentleman will notice that there is a long paragraph, beginning at line 10 and continuing for 10 lines, describing the work that is to be paid for by this appropriation of $623,000.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is not answering my question. How much was estimated for by the gentleman's committee for the purchase and destruction of animals or for quarantining the same?

Mr. SCOTT. There was no separate estimate for that purpose, for the reason, as I say, whether any is needed or not depends largely upon emergencies, and we did not make a special estimate for it, because if the emergency arises the money which otherwise would be expended in other projects can be used for this purpose under the language of the bill——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. How much was expended last year for that purpose?

Mr. SCOTT. Let me finish this statement—and in such case it produces a deficiency which the Committee on Appropriations takes care of. During the present fiscal year I do not know of any that has been expended, although it may have been expended. The report simply has not been made, because the fiscal year has not yet ended. In the fiscal year ending 1909 my recollection is that about $400,000 was expended, the emergency growing out of the foot-and-mouth contagion which spread throughout four or five States.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That entire $400,000 was a deficiency, was it not, appropriated for by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SCOTT. It did create a deficiency in this appropriation and the Committee on Appropriations provided for it.

Mr. CARLIN. I understood the gentleman to say yesterday that this was a very important duty that the law imposed on the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. What I said yesterday was that it was very important, in my judgment, to have the department clothed with authority to purchase and destroy infected animals; that without such authority we could not have stamped out the foot-and-mouth disease as we have done on two different occasions within the last ten years.

Mr. CARLIN. How does the gentleman reach his estimate of $623,000, when the only things provided for for which this money is to be spent are the first items to which I have referred and, second, the eradication of scabies and the inspection of southern cattle?

Mr. SCOTT. Let me begin at the beginning of the paragraph. It says:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle.

The average annual expenditure for that purpose alone for several years past has been about $300,000. "The inspection of southern cattle" and "the supervision of the transportation of live stock" relate to the maintenance of the quarantine line which extends across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific——

Mr. CARLIN. But you have a separate appropriation for the quarantine line; it is not included in this item.

Mr. SCOTT. And we also have an inspection of cattle in any part of the country where contagious diseases may exist, the law requiring that they shall be inspected before being shipped in interstate commerce.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am trying——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to ascertain from the gentleman how they arrive at the estimate of $623,000 which we are asked to appropriate. Now, you say $300,000 of it is for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle. How do we get the other $323,000?

Mr. SCOTT. I have not the project book of the Bureau of Animal Industry here, and I do not know exactly how this amount is divided. We appropriated for this purpose last year $625,000, and the Secretary this year estimated that he could get along with a couple of thousand dollars less, and so brought in his estimate for $623,000. The work has been proceeding for a great many years on approximately the same amount, and the committee has not inquired every year for the details of the appropriation. I just happened to remember that there has been spent for this western scabies work from $300,000 to $325,000 a year.

Mr. CARLIN. Does not the gentleman think the House is entitled to know the items for which this money is expected to be expended and the estimates upon which this amount is based?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the House has pretty accurate information on the matter when we bunch in one paragraph quarantine work, inspection, and other work which is of the same general character, and provide a lump-sum appropriation for it. To present the bill in such detail as the gentleman suggests would not only multiply the pages in the bill, but it would multiply the bookkeeping work in the bureau almost beyond reason.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman does not seem to understand me. I do not think the bill ought to be burdened with the details, but I think that somebody ought to be able to state to the House what is expected to be done with the $323,000.

Mr. SCOTT. The committee thinks the language describes what is to be done with this $623,000.

Mr. CARLIN. The language of the law says that it shall be used for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the amount required for which you say is $300,000. Now, I have no desire——

Mr. SCOTT. I have here the estimates upon which the bill was based.

Mr. CARLIN. That is what I would like to get at.

Mr. SCOTT. Under the head of "Inspection and quarantine" there are salaries outside of Washington amounting to $375,000. I presume the gentleman does not care to know to whom the salaries are paid?

Mr. CARLIN. Does that relate to the importation of animals?

Mr. SCOTT. That relates to inspection and quarantine.

Mr. CARLIN. It is the inspection and quarantine of animals we are discussing.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly; this bureau has nothing to do with anything except animals.

Mr. CARLIN. Why do you insert the word "southern" in line 12, when you say we inspect cattle everywhere?

Mr. SCOTT. That language has always been in the bill. I assume it is because it is only southern cattle that it is necessary to inspect at all times if they enter into interstate commerce, because the Texas fever, as we call it, is endemic in the South. It is always in existence there, although we hope it will not always be; and that being true, it has been thought necessary for several years to maintain a quarantine and to provide for the inspection of southern cattle.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he stated that it requires $300,000 for the eradication of scabies in sheep and $375,000 for salaries in connection with quarantine stations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I stated that the $375,000 provided for all the salaries paid under this inspection and quarantine paragraph outside of Washington.

Mr. CARLIN. You also stated that $300,000 was used in the eradication of scabies. Does that include salaries also?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; that includes salaries of men engaged in that work.

Mr. CARLIN. Do you not think your committee had in mind that some money of this $323,000 would be expended for the purposes relating to the first part of this paragraph?

Mr. SCOTT. We undoubtedly thought it might, if the emergency arose.

Mr. CARLIN. Were you not providing the money for it?

Mr. SCOTT. No; we were not providing the money for it, for the reason we could not foresee whether any money would be needed or how much would be needed.

Mr. CARLIN. And part of this appropriation was to be used for the purpose set forth in the paragraph?

Mr. SCOTT. If it became necessary; but the money was to be replaced by an appeal to the Committee on Appropriations in the way of a deficiency, as it has always been in the past.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, passing from that for a moment, has the gentleman any objection to an amendment striking out the word "southern" in line 12?

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman state briefly what reason he has for suggesting that it be stricken out?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes. I do not think the Secretary of Agriculture ought to be limited in the inspection of cattle to southern cattle. He ought to have the right to inspect northern cattle, eastern cattle, and western cattle, and any other kind of cattle, if it is necessary to do so.

Mr. SCOTT. I think undoubtedly he has that right under the next clause of the paragraph, the supervision of the transportation of live stock, because he could not very well supervise the transportation of live stock without inspecting the cattle.

Mr. CARLIN. Then there could be no objection to striking out the word?

Mr. SCOTT. I see no objection to it. I am willing to accept such an amendment.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, in line 19 we find "tuberculin and mallein testing of animals." I understood you to say those tests only applied to the District of Columbia and the Territories?

Mr. SCOTT. No; I did not make that statement, if the gentleman will permit me. I stated expressly, and I thought clearly, that under a provision that has been carried in this bill for two or three years the department has made a study of the prevalence of tuberculosis throughout the country, and in doing so has applied this tuberculin test in various places.

Mr. CARLIN. They would not have any right to apply this in the States without the consent of the person who owned the animals?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly not, but the owners of the animals are always delighted to have the government officials come and test their stock.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, then, would you have any objection to inserting this amendment in line 19, after the word "animals," namely, adding the words "the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States and elsewhere, only with the consent of parties owning the animals?"

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think the amendment is necessary. You have said yourself, and I take your judgment for it, that the Government could not apply these tests without the consent of the owners of the animals; and if that is true, why set it out in the law?

Mr. CARLIN. Why not?

Mr. SCOTT. Because it is not necessary. It is mere surplusage.

Mr. CARLIN. Is it not always best to make the law as perfect as possible?

Mr. SCOTT. If it is so plain, now that the gentleman from Virginia can not doubt it, it would certainly seem unnecessary to try to make it plainer.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not doubt its meaning.

Mr. SCOTT. I thought the gentleman stated that he did not believe the Government had the right.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no doubt as to the law, but I doubt the method of its application.

Mr. SCOTT. That is different. So long as the law itself is plain, I do not see how there can be very much controversy about the method of its application.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. If we are to put it in there, would not that prevent this inspection in interstate transportation at the request of the owner?

Mr. SCOTT. It might have that effect.

Mr. CARLIN. I will provide for that. In other words, I think this. I will be frank with the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. CARLIN. I ask an additional five minutes; my time has been used by others.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARLIN. The point I am making is this: I want to prevent the interference with the States by the Agricultural Department, though I am willing to yield cooperation between the States and the Agricultural Department wherever that can be accomplished.

Mr. SCOTT. Has the gentleman heard any complaint on account of interference of the Bureau of Animal Industry with the States?

Mr. CARLIN. I have not from any State, but a great deal of discussion made in reference to the States. Now, I can not go into that this morning. I am not here with a grievance, and do not desire to appear in that light; but I do want to perfect this law so that the appropriation of the Government's money, $623,000, may be used for the purpose expressed in the appropriation bill. The gentleman says that it is intended to use it for the same purpose as that stated in the bill; and I am simply trying to perfect the bill. I find all through this appropriation bill you ask items of appropriations of money for many similar purposes to that expressed in this paragraph. The word "quarantine" appears half a dozen times in the bill; and it seems to me we ought to be more certain and explicit in the appropriation of so large a sum of public money.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CARLIN. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. Has the gentleman a concrete proposition in the way of an amendment that will cover his suggestion? I have just come in.

Mr. CARLIN. I have made a concrete proposition, and I am asking the chairman of the committee to accept it.

Mr. LEVER. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Virginia to offer that as an amendment?

Mr. CARLIN. With the consent of the chairman of the committee, I am.

Mr. SCOTT. This language which has been carried in the bill so long is so clearly expressed and so well understood, I should not feel warranted, on the spur of the moment, in accepting an amendment which might easily lead to controversy.

Mr. CARLIN. Suppose we let this item stand open until I can have an opportunity to discuss it privately with you, and then take it up?

Mr. SCOTT. I am quite willing to let the matter rest for the present; and in the meantime I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the hearings on the agricultural appropriation bill, where he will find Doctor Melvin's explanation of the work of his bureau; and I think when the gentleman reads these hearings and learns that through the activity of the Department of Agriculture his own State of Virginia has had 9,778 square miles cleared of the Texas cattle tick, resulting in direct advantage to his own people to the extent of millions of dollars, I take it he will perhaps feel that the interference of the Department of Agriculture with the people of his State is not to the disadvantage of those people.

Mr. CARLIN. I was not aware of that statement of Doctor Melvin, and I am not prepared to deny it; but I am prepared to say it would be quite a surprise to me that such a result has been accomplished.

Mr. LAMB. It has certainly been done.

Mr. SCOTT. It is the report of the chief of the bureau, and of course he would not have so reported unless it was true.

Mr. CARLIN. Let this matter pass over.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Virginia has yielded the floor.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to ask the chairman one question in my own right. I merely wanted to understand if the gentleman from Kansas agrees with the gentleman from Virginia that he might agree to the amendment that he talks about. If there is to be any such amendment, the House and not the gentleman will put it on.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly. The only intent of my remark to the gentleman from Virginia was to accede to his request that we talk it over.

Mr. CARLIN. If our conversation will not lead to any mutual benefit, then it is a waste of time to talk it over.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. There has been a good deal of time wasted, or at least consumed.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman from Missouri is a member of the committee. I will ask him; and if he can answer the question, I will consume no more time. Can the gentleman tell me how this $623,000 is to be expended?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will answer it clearly enough for any gentleman to understand. So much of it as is necessary to be expended at all will be expended for the exact purposes stated in that paragraph of the bill.

Mr. CARLIN. How much of that is to be expended for the inspection of vessels?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do not know; and let me say to the gentleman from Virginia that I take it that on a bill appropriating twelve or fifteen million dollars there is no one in this House who can answer in detail every question as to the dollars and cents that will be expended under any particular item.

Mr. CARLIN. On every appropriation bill that comes into this House from a committee some one can always explain how the money is to be expended.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Not as to how much will be expended for a purpose of this kind, when we do not know how prevalent a disease will be; but it is our duty to appropriate so that the department will have the necessary money to protect the country against the disease, if the emergency arises.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of saying three or four words, more or less.

It seems to me that a technical discussion of all the items in an appropriation bill like this is not conducive to the throwing of any light upon the subject. It is utterly impossible for anybody dealing with all these matters to know exactly how much will necessarily be used for each item carried in a clause like this. The aggregate amount is stated, and an approximate sum might be estimated for each individual item. A certain amount of segregation is useful. Too much of it is voluminous and adds nothing to the information of the House. Here is an appropriation that has been going on for years for a very valuable work for the people of the United States. The total amount expended for all these items shows that this amount is practically necessary; and to harass the chairman of the committee with the idea of asking him for details that it is impossible for any man to have in his mind is not in my judgment in the line of good legislative procedure.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the additional fact that in this paragraph we are dealing largely with matters as to which no man can tell what will happen in the course of twelve months; that is, the amount of the disease or the necessity for the quarantine.

Mr. SCOTT. If the chairman of the committee were able to answer every specific question asked by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] and state in dollars and cents the amount that was to be expended for the eradication of scabies in sheep, for the inspection of vessels, and for the inspection of southern cattle, how could the statement of those amounts convey any information to the membership of the House? How could they determine whether the amounts appropriated were exactly right or not?

Mr. CARLIN. I did entertain the idea that when your committee reported a provision giving the Secretary of Agriculture the right to purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals, or to quarantine the same, whenever in his judgment it was necessary to prevent the spread of pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases to animals in other States, and then you asked for an appropriation of $623,000 for that purpose, that some of that $623,000 ought not to be appropriated since the Chair has ruled that that is without authority of law.

Mr. SCOTT. We made no provision for the purchase and destruction of animals in this paragraph, because the committee regarded it as an emergency which could not be foreseen, and because the committee understood that if such an emergency did arise a deficit would be created which would be taken care of in the usual way.

Mr. CARLIN. That was not only for the purchase and destruction of animals, but for quarantining the same, to prevent the spread of tuberculosis, pneumonia, or other diseases of animals, which purpose was stricken from the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why does not the gentleman propose an amendment reducing the amount?

Mr. CARLIN. I have been trying to ascertain how much it should be reduced.

Mr. TAWNEY. You can make a guess at it; can you not?

Mr. CARLIN. I prefer not to guess. I was trying to act intelligently, and I thought the House wanted to get at the facts.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think the Agricultural Committee have adopted the best language that it could possibly use. As the chairman has stated to the committee, if none of these appropriations have been contemplated in the purchase of diseased cattle, it would be brought in the deficiency bill.

The question of diseased cattle affects the human being so much that it occurs to me that even if the appropriation seems to be a little large, the House can well afford to make it. Tuberculosis in cattle may, as we know, convey the germ of tuberculosis to human beings. I think the chairman yesterday erroneously stated on the floor that milk is not a conveyor of the germ of tuberculosis. While there has been some question about that, I think at the present time there is good evidence that it is a conveyor of the germ of this disease.

Mr. SCOTT. I was quoting officials in the bureau as authority.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. But in the reports of the Bureau of Animal Industry, I think, they take the ground that it is conveyed through the medium of milk. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that this paragraph ought not to be passed over with a view to any amendment, but that it is all right as it is, and I believe that we ought to stand by it. Let us do what we can to stamp out this dread disease of tuberculosis, that takes away so many of our people each year, and the proper study of this disease and the best way to prevent it in the animal will help to prevent the infection of human beings. The officers of the Bureau of Animal Industry are doing a great work along these lines, and I hope that Congress will encourage their efforts.

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $250,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask a question about lines 21 and 22. They read as follows: "For all necessary expenses for the eradication of the southern cattle tick, $250,000." Is it the intention by using this language to prevent the spread of the splenic or Texas fever?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that there is only one kind of tick that produces the splenic or Texas fever, and I will ask if it would not be better to amend this item so as to make a specific appropriation? Otherwise you would have every kind of a tick come under the ban of the law, whether injurious or not. It is a well-known fact, fully proven by the experts, that there is only one kind of a tick that produces the splenic fever. An animal carrying this kind of tick from a southern country to one farther north, even though the animal was itself healthy, will communicate this splenic fever to any cattle it may graze with. I do not think this appropriation should apply to all kinds of ticks, but only to the fever tick, thus making the language definitely apply to that kind.

Mr. LAMB. Are there any good ticks? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; all ticks are injurious to animals, but there is only one kind that will give the splenic or Texas fever, and I think we ought to have a specific appropriation, so as to only quarantine against this specific fever tick.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think it is necessary. I do not believe the officials of the department are wasting any part of the appropriation in fighting these——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Benevolent ticks. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. These benevolent and innocent and harmless ticks.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No question has arisen about any tick except the fever tick, and ticks that do not communicate this disease should not be included in this law.

Mr. SCOTT. I never heard any complaints made that money was spent for the eradication of anything but this tick which causes the fever.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will read the reports on Texas or splenic fever in cattle he will find that there are 15 or 20 different varieties of ticks.

Mr. SCOTT. I know there is a large number of varieties.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And only one kind that is extremely harmful and dangerous to cattle, and this kind only should be the object of this legislation, and I thought that it might be better to make this appropriation specific, so that cattle not having that kind of ticks on them would not be subject to quarantine regulations.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the gentleman that the work has been going on for years under this same language, and I do not think an amendment is necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and the necessary construction and alterations of buildings thereon, and the necessary expenses for investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products, $108,000.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. What was the appropriation for that station last year?

Mr. SCOTT. The appropriation was $25,000 for the purchase of the land.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to give my hearty approval to the item. I have seen the work that is done there, and it is a magnificent work, most useful, and most important. I am surprised that the item is as small as it is. I think it is something that should be encouraged, and I congratulate the committee upon having made so good a start in so good a work. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much of this money is to go for construction? The reason I ask is that while I agree somewhat with what the gentleman from Iowa has said as to unnecessary subdivisions, my opinion is that it is always wise to keep construction accounts separate from the general accounts, for otherwise under a supposed appropriation for a specific purpose you will find that you are building a lot of costly buildings, and then a deficiency is created in the accounts, which has to be supplied later on.

Mr. SCOTT. As a general proposition, of course the position taken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is absolutely sound. But this is in the nature of a stock farm, where breeding and other experiments in the line of animal husbandry will be carried on and it is necessary to have a continuing authority for construction, because the needs of the place can not be forecast a year in advance. A new box stall may be needed now or a new hog pen then or a new sheep cote at some other time, and the committee was of opinion that it ought to be carried in this way.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why not carry an item for construction?

Mr. SCOTT. Because it is impossible to estimate in advance just what construction will be needed.

Mr. SHERLEY. But an approximation can be made on that. Just to illustrate how that works out, I will state that we have had put up to the Committee on Appropriations, year after year, a proposition to build a dairy out here at the insane asylum, the items for which seemed to every member on that committee to be grossly extravagant. If the sundry civil bill had carried a general item with "construction of buildings" in it, that dairy would have been constructed years ago. I suggest that the gentleman's experience will parallel that in matters of this kind, that if you leave in a general appropriation bill the word "construction" a good deal more will go for construction than for the other purposes intended by the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will notice that this sum is so small that very little abuse could arise from it, and he will notice, also, that the whole paragraph practically applies to construction. It is for no other purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, the gentleman is entirely mistaken about that. It starts out with the statement "for all necessary expenses for scientific investigations," and so forth.

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he was addressing himself to the paragraph beginning with line 12, that was under discussion by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; that paragraph has not been read. The paragraph which has been read is from lines 5 to 11, inclusive. That has been raised from $25,000 of last year to $108,000 this year.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I entirely misunderstood the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN], and I must therefore ask to correct my answer to him. I thought he was speaking of the paragraph beginning on line 12. Gentlemen will realize, of course, that my attention is distracted so much that I can not always follow the reading at the desk. Therefore I answered that last year the appropriation for this purpose was $25,000. I should have answered that it was $109,000. It has been reduced this year by $1,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. I again call the gentleman's attention to the language "and the necessary construction and alterations of buildings thereon."

Mr. SCOTT. That language has been in this particular paragraph for a great many years, and the committee has followed it up closely. There has never been any abuse of it. We have not thought it practicable to estimate in advance, for the reason that it was impossible to tell six months ahead whether you would need a hogpen in April or a sheepcot in May or a chicken coop in September, and we trusted to the integrity and discretion of the gentlemen who have charge of the stations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. "Alterations" would take care of those small items, but "construction" is a matter that looks to larger expenditures; and while I congratulate the committee on its vigilance in preventing an abuse in the past, my experience has been so marked in that respect that I fear they will not always be able to do it in the future. Every department asks to have "construction" put into its general items, and then they can go ahead and put up the buildings and create deficits that must be supplied, because they have spent most of the original allowance for building instead of for the real purpose given.

Mr. SCOTT. I realize fully that the language renders the provision liable to abuse. I can only answer that in this particular case there does not seem to be any other way to handle it, and up to this time there has never been any cause for complaint on the part of the committee that the authority given had been abused.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not on this occasion offer any amendment, but I suggest in the next year's hearings the gentleman discover how much is needed for construction and then cut out that part of it in this paragraph and make a new paragraph authorizing new construction.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will bear in mind the suggestion.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for the equipment of a bureau experiment station, including the necessary construction and alterations of buildings thereon, the construction and repair of fences, roadways, drains, and other incidental work, $12,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that this is new legislation?

Mr. SCOTT. Under the authority of the current appropriation act there was purchased something like 480 acres of land for a bureau experiment station at a cost which does not exceed $25,000. The purpose of this appropriation is to equip that station with the necessary buildings, fences, drains, and so forth.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many acres of land are there?

Mr. SCOTT. About 480.

Mr. TAWNEY. Where is it located?

Mr. SCOTT. About 12 miles east of the city of Washington.

Mr. TAWNEY. What did we pay per acre for it?

Mr. SCOTT. In the neighborhood of $50 an acre; $52.50 an acre, I think.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it improved land?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; it is improved land. Parts of it, of course, may be in wood lot, but the land consists of two old farms, and most of it is under cultivation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the act authorizing the purchase of this land also authorize the establishment of a bureau experiment station and the construction of necessary buildings?

Mr. SCOTT. It does not. The appropriation was made in this language:

For the purchase of additional land for a bureau experiment station, not to exceed $25,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. For "additional land;" did we own land before?

Mr. SCOTT. We own land at Bethesda, Md.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, it is part of that station at Bethesda, Md.?

Mr. SCOTT. I will state the case to the gentleman. A year ago, when the estimates were under consideration, the department asked for $25,000 to buy some land that is now being rented immediately contiguous to land which the department owns near Bethesda, Md. The expectation at that time was that this land would be purchased and added to the Bethesda station. After the act had passed the Secretary and the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, upon further consideration, reached the conclusion that the price asked for the land at Bethesda was higher than it would be profitable for the Government to pay. The owner asked something like $350 an acre, whereas it was the opinion of the Secretary that land could be bought for $40 or $50 an acre that would serve for this work, and consequently he began an investigation, taking several months of time to look into the matter carefully, and finally concluded that the best proposition he could secure was the one to which I have just referred, a couple of old farms lying east of Washington, which could be had for about $50 an acre. We have been carrying on at Bethesda pathological investigations, including research work in relation to the diseases of animals, and also some experiments in animal breeding. There was not room in the 50 acres which we owned at Bethesda to carry out this work successfully, because animals which are being experimented upon for pathological results ought to be separated from animals which are intended to be kept in good health for breeding purposes. It is therefore the intention of the department to separate the work and establish on the new farm the breeding, feeding, and other animal-husbandry work, and let the Bethesda station confine its attention entirely to pathological studies.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This is really a new station to be established on this land?

Mr. SCOTT. It is really a new station to undertake what is believed to be extremely important work.

Mr. TAWNEY. The work, especially the pathological work, is being done at the Bethesda station that the Agricultural Department deems important in connection with animals. Now, did I understand the gentleman to say this was a breeding station?

Mr. SCOTT. They have been carrying on some experiments in animal breeding there. There are a great many problems in connection with this work which have not been solved.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are there not other institutions of that kind being carried on under the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department in other States?

Mr. SCOTT. The difference is this: In other States breeding experiments are conducted for the purpose of securing the best possible individuals of the different kinds of domestic animals. At Bethesda the experiments are being carried on with a view to determining the results of inbreeding, cross-breeding, and similar problems.

Mr. TAWNEY. And also pathological work generally?

Mr. SCOTT. And pathological work generally.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not the gentleman think that is about as far as we ought to go?

Mr. SCOTT. No. The work which they propose to do——

Mr. TAWNEY. Is there any limit to the extent to which this department ultimately will go if Congress continues to encourage them?

Mr. SCOTT. The department is looked upon, and I think properly looked upon, as the highest source of authority by the country generally upon all questions relating to agriculture, and——

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, the station at Bethesda is primarily for the purpose of determining or protecting animals from disease and also the effect of inbreeding, and so forth?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. And it seems to me that as this work does not have any relation to the other proposition I shall have to make the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, speaking to the point of order, I do not care to discuss it further than to say that the question is not whether this bill gives a right to buy land. That was passed upon last year. The land has been bought and the work has been entered upon. The question now is whether this bill shall be permitted to bear an appropriation to carry forward the work.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman to say that the land was bought for the purpose of extending the Bethesda station, not for the purpose of establishing an independent experiment bureau there. This is an entirely new proposition. I understood the gentleman to say in his answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]——

Mr. SCOTT. I gave the history of the appropriation, and stated that in the beginning it was the expectation merely to buy additional land at Bethesda. But the language was so framed under the old act that I think the Secretary has been wholly within his rights in buying land entirely apart from the station at Bethesda, because the language is "for the purchase of additional land," not in Bethesda or at any particular place, "for a bureau experiment station."

But I take it the question of the item in last year's bill is not to be considered in passing upon this paragraph. The only question in this point of order is whether the work having been undertaken we can now make an appropriation to carry it forward.

The CHAIRMAN. The lines in the appropriation bill for last year provided:

For the purchase of additional land for a bureau experiment station, not to exceed $25,000.

That is the authority for the purchase of the land and is confined to that, and is the only authority cited by the chairman of the committee for the work contemplated in the part of the paragraph to which the point of order has been made.

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly; and the land has been bought as provided in last year's act.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules and precedents, under them it can hardly be contended that the purchase of land is a work in progress sufficient to justify an appropriation for the construction of buildings on the land so purchased.

The rule requiring appropriations to be authorized by existing law excepts those "in continuance of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." But an appropriation in violation of existing law or to extend a service beyond a fixed limit is not in order as the continuance of a public work. Interruption of a work does not necessarily remove it from the privileges of the rule, but the continuation of the work must not be so conditioned in relation to place as to become a new work. It has been held that a work has not been begun within the meaning of the rule when an appropriation has been made for a site for a public building or when a commission has been created to select a site or when a site has actually been selected for a work.

The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general administrative work, including traveling expenses and salaries of employees engaged in such work, rent in the city of Washington, office fixtures and supplies, express, freight, telegraph, telephone, and other necessary expenses, $51,040.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if he will incorporate in the RECORD to-morrow, if possible, a statement of the rate paid to express companies, railroad companies, telegraph and telephone companies, for the express, freight, telephone, and telegraph charges which the Government is sending and receiving in all of the bureaus of this department? The object, Mr. Chairman, is twofold. I would like to find out whether or not the rate is uniform to all the bureaus and departments of the Government, and for the further purpose of finding out whether or not the Government is paying to the express companies, telephone and telegraph companies, and railroad companies exorbitant prices for the service rendered. I believe that the people generally are paying too much, and I have been wondering whether or not these companies have been discriminating in favor of the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman probably will admit that the Government, on account of the very large amount of business, ought to be entitled to some consideration?

Mr. MORSE. Why, Mr. Chairman, I am not certain that I would admit even that. I am not taking a position on this question at this time. I am looking for information on the proposition, and will feel it to be my duty to ask, when the various appropriations are presented to Congress, what the Government is paying for these different services.

Mr. SCOTT. I presented this morning, before the reading of the bill began, a statement of the rate that is being paid to the Western Union Telegraph Company, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman yesterday. I was sorry that he was not on the floor, as that would have been the time to present the matter. He will see by the size of the volume I hold in my hand that an answer to his question even as to the telegraph and telephone companies would burden the RECORD very materially. Here are the contracts entered into between the Department of Agriculture and the various telegraph, telephone, and cable companies. To print all of them, or even samples of them, would burden the RECORD. I gave a sample this morning, in response to the gentleman's request, a very brief summary of the rates that are paid, according to this contract, to the Western Union Telegraph Company, and I should be glad to have him look over this book of contracts before pressing his inquiry further.

Mr. MORSE. Did the chairman state whether the rate paid was paid by one bureau or paid by all the bureaus of the department?

Mr. SCOTT. I stated only the rate paid by the Weather Bureau; but I may add that the contract is made with the Department of Agriculture and the same rate would apply to all the bureaus in that department.

Mr. MORSE. Would it not be possible for the gentleman to give us a summary to-morrow, the same as he did this morning, of the rate paid to the telephone companies and the express companies? I am particularly anxious to get at the rate paid to the express companies.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, it is a new question. I do not know whether it can be presented or not. I suppose the rate varies so much, a different rate being paid for every different shipment, that it would be a pretty hard matter to present the summary the gentleman requests.

Mr. MORSE. My idea was that there was a uniform cut or reduction made to the Government by the express companies. I do not know whether that was true or not; and what I would like to know is this: Is a different rate made for each place to which a package is shipped?

Mr. SCOTT. I have no information upon that subject. The gentleman would probably get more satisfactory results if he would take up the matter directly with the department. The department has no information that it would not give the gentleman as freely as it would give it to me; and it is a question which does not connect directly with this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking one or two more questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORSE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to be permitted to occupy two minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORSE. Just in reply to the chairman of the committee. I would like to say that this is an exceedingly important matter. It seems to me that it has an important bearing upon this appropriation, as to the amount paid to express, telephone, and telegraph companies. I believe I could get the information directly, but I wanted the information incorporated in the RECORD, in order that the people generally, who have the right to know, could, through that medium, find out what the rates were.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question about this paragraph beginning with line 17:

For general administrative work, including traveling expenses and salaries of employees engaged in such work, rent in the city of Washington, office fixtures and supplies, express, freight, telegraph, telephone, and other necessary expenses, $51,940.

I desire to ask whether or not the salaries here authorized to be paid are salaries to people employed at the seat of Government?

Mr. SCOTT. I think I can answer that question in the affirmative.

Mr. TAWNEY. If so, how many clerks are employed and paid from this appropriation in the department?

Mr. CARLIN. Is not that asking for too detailed and specific information? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. The estimates under the head of administrative expenses show salaries paid in Washington to the aggregate of $33,140.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why is it that the gentleman's committee does not require the department to make specific estimates for the salaries of the clerks employed here in the departments in Washington, and then appropriate for them specifically?

Mr. SCOTT. It does require specific appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. I know the committee has been improving the bill very much in that respect, but my attention was called, as the Clerk was reading, to this paragraph here. It seems to me that we should, as far as possible, require the estimates to be made for these services specifically, and then appropriate according to the estimates.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the answer to the gentleman is found in the character of the employees carried under this provision and the nature of the work they are doing. For instance, the very first salary noted in the estimates is for one Chief of the Biochemical Division, $3,500. That is a special scientific expert who is appointed, under the authority of law, outside of the civil service. And there are chiefs of other divisions appointed in a similar way.

Mr. TAWNEY. How can they be appointed outside of the civil service? The fact that they are appropriated for in a lump sum does not affect the right to be appointed outside of the civil service; and the fact that this man is a scientist, getting a salary of $3,500, is all the more reason why we should appropriate for employees of that kind specifically.

Mr. SCOTT. Is the gentleman certain that the law does not provide for the appointment of scientific employees in this department without an examination?

Mr. TAWNEY. Unless the appropriation says "to be appointed without regard to the civil-service law and regulations." That question arose here on the urgent deficiency bill the other day.

Mr. SCOTT. I am quite sure the gentleman is not informed as to the practice that has been followed in the department.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know about the practice.

Mr. SCOTT. And I think the practice is based upon the law, although I can not just now cite the authority. I know, for example, that the board of referees, to whom have been referred the various pure-food questions, were certainly not required to submit to a civil-service examination.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is under a specific authority. By executive order a man may be exempted from taking a civil-service examination; but my attention was called to that item; and on page 24 of this bill, under the Forest Service, I observe the same thing:

And other labor required in practical forestry and in the administration of national forests, in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

In view of that, I was going to ask the gentleman from Kansas, in charge of the bill, if he would have any objection to a proviso somewhere in this bill something like this:

On page 25, after the word "follows," in line 6, insert:
"Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit in the regular annual estimates for the fiscal year 1912, and annually thereafter, detailed estimates for all clerks, assistants, and other personal services, of whatever name and character, required for the Forest Service at the seat of government, and after the fiscal year 1911 it shall not be lawful to employ, at the seat of government, for or on account of the Forest Service any clerks, assistants, or other personal service of whatever name or character not specifically appropriated for by Congress in terms specifying the number and rates of compensation of all such employments."

I presume a provision of that kind would bring to the attention of the committee all personal service, and I think every committee of this House that makes appropriation for any department of the Government here ought to be fully informed as to the personal services employed here at the city of Washington, and the rate of compensation, and the only way we can ascertain is by requiring them to submit specific estimates and make specific appropriations.

Mr. SCOTT. The committee does require the Secretary of Agriculture to submit a detailed estimate of all the clerks and other employees of the department, no matter whether they are carried on the statutory rolls or in a lump sum. We have in connection with the paragraph under discussion a list of all the employees which are paid for under the head of administrative expenses, with the salary which each one receives. We do not believe it would be in the interest of economy or of good administration to accept the amendment which the gentleman from Minnesota has suggested, for this reason: Most of these employees, all except the scientific men, are engaged as the emergency arises, and the law provides that after they have been paid under a lump sum for one year they shall be transferred to the statutory roll; and if the gentleman will read the bill carefully and make a comparison with last year's bill, he will see that we have transferred altogether some 40 or 50 men this year to statutory rolls, making the corresponding reductions in the lump sums.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have observed that.

Mr. SCOTT. We insist on these transfers being made just as soon as it becomes apparent that the position created is going to be a permanent one.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman has stated that out of this appropriation of $62,760 for all purposes mentioned in the paragraph over $30,000, or one-half of it, was for salaries.

Mr. SCOTT. Thirty-three thousand one hundred and forty dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. Were the ones who drew this salary employed for the entire year?

Mr. SCOTT. I can not answer definitely, but I think some of them were not. Those who were employed during the whole of the year have been already taken out of the lump fund and carried to the statutory roll. The gentleman will not find, except the scientists, a single man who has been employed for more than a year; all those have been transferred to the statutory rolls.

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $1,400,460.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be directed to make the changes in totals in this bureau and in all other cases where amendments are made.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER of Vermont). Unless objection is made, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss very briefly the subject of drainage of the wet and inundated lands in the United States. There has been a great deal said through the press and by the people in recent years on the subject of the conservation of the natural resources, but I doubt if there is any more valuable resource than the wet lands in the United States which have not yet been reclaimed, but which, if reclaimed, will be as valuable and productive as any other lands already under cultivation.

Perhaps it will be somewhat astonishing to observe the area of the wet and inundated lands of the United States. In a report of the United States Geological Survey in 1889 there is a table approximating the areas of these inundated lands in the several States. To give an idea of it I will mention that in Vermont there are from 300 to 500 square miles; in Massachusetts about 500 square miles; New York, 2,000 to 3,000 square miles; Virginia, 1,400 to 1,800; North Carolina, 3,500 to 4,000; South Carolina, 2,500 to 3,000; Florida, 28,000 to 30,000; Mississippi, 8,000 to 10,000; Arkansas, 8,000 to 10,000; Missouri, 2,500 to 3,500; Ohio, 1,000 to 1,500; Minnesota, 5,000 to 7,000; Kansas, 200 to 300; making a minimum of 105,210 square miles and a maximum of 131,200 square miles. I shall here read in full and insert the table referred to.

This report contains a general account of the fresh-water swamps and lowlands of the United States, with a special description of the Dismal Swamp, in the States of Virginia and North Carolina, by Nathaniel S. Shaler.

From this report I quote the appended table:

List of approximate areas of inundated lands in the several States.

In the New England States, the Northwestern States, and Florida considerable areas of shallow, drainable lakes are included in this estimate.

[From the Tenth Annual Report (1888–89) of the United States Geological Survey.]

To give an idea of what that amounts to in acres, I may say that the minimum area includes over 67,000,000 acres of land, and the maximum of inundated land contains more than twice the area of each of the States of Alabama and Arkansas, thirty times the area of Connecticut, more than twice the area of Georgia, three times that of Indiana, one-third more than Kansas or Minnesota, more than twice that of North Carolina or Ohio, and almost twice the area of the State of Washington.

So that these lands, in the aggregate, include a rich empire in undeveloped resources. In North Carolina alone, according to the recent report of the state geological and economic survey, there are in 28 eastern counties located in the tide-water section 4,505 square miles, totaling 2,900,000 acres, and that estimate does not embrace the areas subject to overflow along the navigable streams in the piedmont and mountain section of the State.

It may be well to call the attention of Congress to this valuable national asset and ask whether this great resource should not have greater attention at the hands of Congress, and in the educational work being carried on by the Department of Agriculture.

Illustrating again the area and value of these wet lands, I quote from a statement made yesterday before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors by Mr. Lyman E. Cooley, the noted engineer of Chicago. He said that in the Mississippi Valley there are wet and overflowed lands in the aggregate of 31,220 square miles, containing more than 20,000,000 acres, all of which may be reclaimed by drainage, and he added that these 20,000,000 acres were of greater value than the 50,000,000 acres of semiarid lands which can only be reclaimed by irrigation, and more valuable after they have been reclaimed.

Take the area of these lands as reported by the Geological Survey, and placing their value simply at $10 per acre, which is a minimum sum, it would amount in the aggregate to about $700,000,000. The greater part of these lands are now unreclaimed, and are only valuable for the timber growing thereon. Such of these lands as contained timber have been denuded to a large extent; so that it may be said that this large area in its present condition has no present substantial market value and is adding nothing to the products or wealth of the country.

May they be reclaimed? We are maintaining in the Department of Agriculture a Bureau of Drainage Investigations, for which an appropriation—a modest sum—is made in this bill. The scope of its duties, as I understand it, is largely educational. They send drainage engineers to various parts of the country, to investigate swamp lands and to ascertain if they are susceptible of drainage, and, in some instances, in order to incite the people to a movement among themselves for the drainage of these lands, they make surveys of small areas. That bureau, to my knowledge, is one of the most valuable in the entire Department of Agriculture. In many of the States containing wet lands the work which it has done has brought to the attention of the people the importance of these resources, has led to the adoption of modern drainage laws by a number of States, and these States under these laws have organized drainage districts similar to the irrigation districts which are formed in the semiarid region. They have proceeded in a spirit of cooperation under the state laws to form drainage districts and have drained large bodies of land.

The bureau is doing such excellent work under the immediate administration of Mr. C. G. Elliot that it gives me pleasure to make this public commendation. The educational work and the object lessons afforded under his supervision are of supreme importance in the development of a latent resource. Whether Congress shall, in its wisdom, at some time in the future aid in the reclamation of this vast empire of most fertile land may become an interesting question. My time is not sufficient to discuss the question at this moment, but it may well be argued, if Congress may loan a part of the proceeds of sale of the public lands for the purpose of irrigating the arid and semiarid lands in the Western States, why may it not lend some of this fund or some other fund as an encouragement, and upon a perfectly safe basis of investment, in the drainage of these valuable swamp and wet lands? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, for the present the work of drainage of these lands must rest with the several States. Some of these States have adopted, as I said, modern drainage laws. We have adopted such a law in the State of North Carolina, and there are now drainage districts in the process of formation which, if carried to a successful termination, as seems probable, will insure the efficient drainage of about 300,000 acres of land. These lands have been pronounced by experts in the Bureau of Soils to be as fertile as any of the lands in the Delta of the Mississippi, and I have no doubt they are typical of similar land in other States along the Atlantic seaboard and in some of the Northwestern States, notably Minnesota and the Dakotas. As an indication of this movement, I read with a great deal of pleasure the other day a letter by Mr. B. F. Yoakum, chairman of the executive committee of the Rock Island lines, who has displayed an initiative and resourcefulness in the development of the country tributary to his lines which might well be imitated by other railroad managers.

The letter which I am going to ask to insert and append to my remarks has peculiar reference to the swamp lands in the State of Arkansas, and what he says as to those lands is equally applicable to other swamp lands. The letter is as follows:

DEAR MR. COLE: In reference to our correspondence and talks on the subject of reclamation of unproductive swamp lands, I wish to bring to your attention the importance of reclamation by drainage of the swamp lands of Arkansas and the Mississippi Valley.

From a business standpoint we are all interested in such development, but the question goes far beyond the advantage to any class of individuals or corporations. There is no question before the public at this time so pressing as that of increasing the quantity of foodstuffs of this country. It is an accepted fact that the consumption of food is increasing at a greater ratio than its production. Any proposition which involves the bringing under cultivation more acres of land concerns not only the man or men who will own and cultivate that land, but the millions who will be supplied with its products.

BETTER THAN IRRIGATION.

Much has been accomplished in the Northwest in reclaiming arid lands by irrigation. This is one of the most important works the Government has undertaken, but irrigation of arid lands is slow of results and expensive compared with drainage of our swamp lands; besides, the arid lands put under cultivation by irrigation are usually far from the great consuming centers of the country.

A transportation company is perfectly willing to haul a carload of tomatoes, potatoes, beets, or other vegetables 1,500 or 2,000 miles from an irrigated farm to the city where it is to be eaten, but that is not good business for the thrifty housekeeper who is the one that pays the transportation charges on her supply of table vegetables. The more delicate and luscious fruits and berries which are raised on expensive irrigated lands are really luxuries consumed in expensive city restaurants and hotels and in homes where cost of living does not have to be considered. These far-off irrigated farms do not produce the potatoes, tomatoes, onions, beans, carrots, etc., which are used in kitchens of large congested cities, where small items of cost are matters of serious importance. When we enter fashionable hotels and restaurants in New York, Chicago, and other cities, and order half a cantaloupe at 35 to 40 cents, and oranges, grapes, and luxuries from expensive irrigated farms, transported 2,500 miles by rail, we do not have to count the cost, but the wives of millions of the working classes must consider every penny that is expended for food.

A VAST RICH AREA.

There are in the Mississippi Valley 25,000,000 acres of land, an area equal to the State of Kentucky, with as rich and as productive alluvial soil as can be found anywhere in the world. The Government's Bureau of Drainage has made several surveys of districts in Kansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and its estimate of the cost of draining these lands ready for cultivation is an average of $4.86 per acre.

On the assumption that the Mississippi Valley would be divided into farms of an average size of 80 acres, which would provide 312,500 farmers with comfortable homes, and that there would be 7 persons, including children, to the farm, it would increase the population of that section 2,200,000, which would be added to by the population of numerous thrifty towns. These lands would immediately appreciate in value over their present figure not less than $30 per acre, a total increase of $750,000,000 on land values alone, to say nothing of the farm machinery, live stock, and other property that constitutes a thrifty farming community. The annual products of the Mississippi Valley awaiting drainage, at the low average of $20 per acre, would be worth $500,000,000 annually to the farmers cultivating these lands.

In the State of Arkansas drainage and its results is merely a matter of mathematical calculation. In Arkansas there are 6,000,000 acres of swamp lands awaiting drainage, which, as shown by government reports, will cost $6.88 per acre to prepare for cultivation. We all know that unproductive swamp lands, held at from $8 to $10 per acre, after drainage sell for from $50 to $100 per acre, depending on location; so it is safe to say that the swamp lands of Arkansas when drained would enhance in value $35 per acre. This would add $210,000,000 to the value of the farm lands of your State. Using the same basis as for the Mississippi Valley, of 80 acres to the farm, it would bring into cultivation 75,000 additional farms from lands that are now producing nothing. With 7 persons to the farm, it would mean an increase in the rural population of Arkansas of 525,000 people in sections of the State that are now useless, adding 50 per cent to the entire population of the State.

TWELVE DOLLARS FOR ONE.

The annual production of these 6,000,000 acres at $20 per acre would mean an additional income to the farmers of Arkansas of $120,000,000 annually. Viewing it from another standpoint, an investment of $41,000,000 for the drainage of the swamp lands of Arkansas would increase the wealth of the State one-half a billion dollars. To show the results in another way, under a comprehensive drainage plan the wealth of Arkansas would be increased $12 for each $1 invested in drainage.

By comparison only, and not for criticism, would say that the Government's enterprises in the Northwestern States cost for reclamation of the arid lands by irrigation an average of $35 per acre, while these swamp lands can be placed under cultivation for an average of $5.50 per acre. The results from lands reclaimed through drainage are immediate. Canals and ditches put in during the summer and winter months make the lands ready for cultivation and produce a crop the following spring.

Irrigation projects require a large amount of engineering work, and in some cases several years to control the water for irrigating the lands.

The swamp lands of your State and other Southern States, when drained, will furnish farm and garden products for the kitchens of the populous cities of Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Cincinnati, Cleveland, and many others where millions are to be fed daily, while the irrigated lands produce for comparatively few in number and at too fancy prices for the working classes.

Do not understand me as talking against irrigation. I am for it. It is important work and must be pushed forward. What I do say is that so much more can be done with the same amount of money in reclaiming swamp lands, the results of which will be immediate, with the productiveness where it is most needed. The reclamation of such lands should have immediate consideration.

Government aid for drainage is not without precedent. In France one-third of the cost of large drainage projects is borne by the Government, one-sixth by the State, and the balance by the owners of the land. As recently as 1900 Italy appropriated $48,000,000 for drainage work. The Government of England has at various times come to the aid of drainage projects and is now considering extending this work in the aid of its agricultural development. In our Southern States, where drainage is so important, it would be fair to all interests if the property to be benefited were taxed one-third of the cost, leaving two-thirds to be advanced by the Federal Government and by the States, under a law which would safeguard the Government in its loans, which the property owners would refund to the Federal Government and the States, with a reasonable interest charge for the use of the money loaned.

As a Southerner, I desire to say that the South fights too much for the dead issues of the past. I do not refer entirely to the civil war between the States, its traditions and feelings. While not forgetting the past, let us organize to fight for the future.

Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, recently said, "Go South, young man." He no doubt had in mind the overlooked opportunities in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia, comprising a total acreage of 612,000,000 acres, with only 145,000,000 acres under cultivation. In your State only 20 per cent of the land is in cultivation, while in Iowa 85 per cent is in cultivation. Only one acre out of every seven in Louisiana is improved, while over seven acres of every ten in Ohio are under cultivation. Only 7,000,000 of the 29,000,000 acres of Mississippi have been improved, while eight out of ten acres in Illinois are tilled. Texas has 167,000,000 acres of land with only 19,000,000 in cultivation. This vast difference is not caused by the fertility of the soil, but is simply neglected opportunities.

The enterprising men of the great Far West and Northwest have organized and they have induced the Government to contract to advance $114,000,000 to reclaim arid lands by irrigation. This is good work. The country needs such development. The same effort should be directed toward getting aid for the drainage of the rich lands of the South. It costs less and the results are quicker and the reclaimed lands closer to the populous cities. Lands deep with rich soil, equal in extent to an European empire, only a few miles from the great markets, await redemption for the farmers. Money will be needed, and money will be provided if the southern people organize and are willing to have their country go forward as other sections are progressing.

This question is one of great public importance, and this is an opportune time to push it.

Yours, very truly, B. F. YOAKUM.

Mr. G. A. COLE,
President Farmers' Union, Fayetteville, Ark.

I only desired this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to make these few remarks upon what I said I believed to be one of the most important items of our national resources, and while at present it seems to me entirely incumbent upon the several States in which these lands are located to provide for their reclamation, yet, to repeat, we may well consider whether some plan might be devised so that Congress could come to the aid of sections where these lands are located. In many cases these wet lands are located in sparsely settled sections where the people are unable to help themselves. Why may Congress not make a temporary investment, absolutely safe, and thereby add these lands of such great fertility and productiveness to the national area and thus increase the aggregate of corn, wheat, and other food products? This movement would surely afford a ready remedy for the existing complaints about high prices of living. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry: One plant physiologist and pathologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,250; 1 editor, $2,000; 1 superintendent of gardens and grounds, $1,800; 1 officer in charge of records, $2,000; 3 executive clerks, at $1,980 each; 1 executive assistant in grain investigations, $1,800; 1 executive assistant in farm management, $1,800; 4 clerks, class 4; 8 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,500; 15 clerks, class 2; 33 clerks, class 1; 1 seed clerk and superintendent, $1,200; 1 clerk, $1,080; 2 clerks, at $1,020 each; 19 clerks, at $1,000 each; 19 clerks, at $900 each; 16 clerks, at $840 each; 1 clerk, $800; 31 clerks, messengers, or laborers, at $720 each; 16 clerks, messengers, or laborers, at $660 each; 30 clerks, messengers, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 gardener, $1,200; 1 gardener, $1,100; 2 gardeners or assistants, at $1,000 each; 6 gardeners, at $900 each; 2 gardeners, at $840 each; 4 gardeners, at $780 each; 8 gardeners, at $720 each; 3 gardeners, at $660 each; 1 gardener, $600; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 3 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 6 skilled laborers, at $540 each; 19 skilled laborers, messengers, or messenger boys, at $480 each; 3 laborers or charwomen, at $480 each; 1 laborer or charwoman, $360; 2 laborers, at $420 each; 6 charwomen, at $240 each; 4 messenger boys, at $360 each; 3 messenger boys, at $300 each; in all, $255,270.

General expenses, Bureau of Plant Industry: For all necessary expenses in the investigation of fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, tobacco, vegetables, grasses, forage, drug, medicinal, poisonous, fiber, and other plants and plant industries, in cooperation with other branches of the department, the state experiment stations, and practical farmers; for rent and repairs in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and for the employment of all investigators, local and special agents, agricultural explorers, experts, clerks, illustrators, assistants, and all labor and other necessary expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere required for the investigations, experiments, and demonstrations herein authorized, as follows:

For investigations of plant diseases and pathological collections, $21,710;

For the control of diseases of orchard and other fruits, $34,075;

For the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, $16,510;

For the control of diseases of cotton, truck crops, and related plants, $12,960;

For investigating the physiology of crop plants and for testing and breeding varieties thereof, $25,015;

For soil bacteriology, plant nutrition, and water purification investigations, $23,725;

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of cotton by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, $34,670;

For drug plant, poisonous plant, tea culture, and general physiological and fermentation investigations, $42,970;

For crop technological and fiber plant investigations, $13,030;

For investigating the handling, grading, and baling of cotton, and the establishment of standards for the different grades thereof and for carrying into effect the provisions of law relating thereto, $36,050;

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $51,020;

For physical investigations in connection with the various lines of work herein authorized, $15,255;

To collect, purchase, propagate, test, and experiment with seeds of interest to agriculture, including rare new seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, $16,650;

For studying and testing commercial seeds, including the testing of samples of seeds of grasses, clover, or alfalfa secured in the open market, and where such samples are found to be adulterated or misbranded the results of the tests shall be published, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale, $25,830;

For the investigation and improvement of grains and methods of grain production, $61,925;

For the investigation and improvement of methods of growing, producing, and handling tobacco, $22,330;

For general plant breeding and cooperative plant breeding demonstrations, $13,700;

For testing and breeding fibrous plants, which may be used for paper making, $8,775;

For the breeding and physiological study of alkali-resistant and drought-resistant crops, $17,500;

For the investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture, $23,075;

For taxonomic investigations and the study of methods for the improvement of grazing lands, $17,650;

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $130,060;

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $215,155;
For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under semiarid or dry-land conditions, $31,730;
For investigations in connection with the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act, and other areas in the arid and semiarid regions, $74,380;
For investigating the methods of growing, harvesting, packing, storing, handling, and shipping fruits and melons, and for experimental shipments of fruits and melons within the United States and to foreign countries, $71,615;
To cultivate and care for experimental gardens and grounds, manage and maintain conservatories, greenhouses, and plant and fruit propagating houses, $13,540;
For continuing the necessary improvements to establish and maintain a general experiment farm and agricultural station on the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 18, 1900, and for other general horticultural investigations, $34,930;
For the maintenance of a testing garden on the Fort Brown Military Reservation at Brownsville, Tex., $9,100;
For general administrative expenses connected with the above-mentioned lines of investigation, including the office of the chief of bureau, the assistant chief of bureau, the chief clerk, the editor, records, supplies, and property, and for miscellaneous expenses incident thereto, $42,811;
In all, for general expenses, $1,158,346.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order against certain provisions in the section just read, beginning in line 17, page 13, with the word "each," down to and including the word "dollars," on page 20. Also, the word "fifteen," in line 22, and the word "thirty-three," in line 22. Also, in line 25, the following, "2 clerks, at $1,020 each." In line 1, page 14, the word "nineteen," at the end of the line. In line 4, the word "thirty-one," and also the words "messengers or laborers;" in line 5, the word "sixteen;" in line 6, at the end of the line, the word "thirty;" in lines 8 and 9, down to and including the word "dollars;" in line 13, the word "eight;" in line 16, the word "three;" in line 17, the word "six;" in line 18, the word "nineteen;" beginning with the word "three," in line 20, down to and including the word "each," in line 24.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I presume the gentleman from New York makes the point of order against this paragraph——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order or reserve it?

Mr. MALBY. I reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. SCOTT. I trust the gentleman will make the point of order; we might as well pass upon this question right now. I presume the point of order is made upon the proposition that these are new positions now being created.

Mr. MALBY. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. In answer to that, let me say that no new position is created. The different clerks to which the gentleman has called attention, mechanics and employees of different grades, have all been, and are now, in the employ of the department. They have been paid under the lump sums for the various bureaus and have been transferred to the statutory roll in accordance with the law, which provides that after an employee has been engaged for a period of a year in the same position under any lump fund he shall then be transferred to the statutory roll.

I can state to the gentleman from New York and the committee that there is absolutely not one new position created, nor is there provision made for the employment of a single individual who is not already employed in the department, nor is there any increase in anybody's salary.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. BOWERS. I notice the increase in the total of appropriation under this head is from $210,570 to $255,270. Is a like decrease made in the lump-sum appropriations carried in the bill?

Mr. SCOTT. A like decrease is made in the lump-sum appropriations. There is a net increase under this paragraph of $44,760, but a corresponding amount has been deducted from the lump sums of the different bureaus.

Mr. BOWERS. Just where in this bill is the lump-sum appropriation carried?

Mr. SCOTT. It is carried in different bureaus. At the request of the committee a change in the administration has been made in the department whereby instead of having painters, carpenters, and other mechanics carried upon the lump sums of the respective bureaus they are all carried on the Secretary's roll and are all immediately subject to his direction. In other words, the mechanical force of the entire department, instead of being scattered around through the various bureaus, has been concentrated in the Secretary's office in the interest, as we believe, of more efficient administration and of greater economy in expenditure; and it is to carry out that scheme of concentration that the changes have been made to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] has called attention. I think his point of order will not lie, because no new position has been created and no salary has been increased.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that there was any authorization in the law for "one executive assistant in grain investigations." It occurred to me as though that created a specific office, a position which carried with it some new authority of an unknown character. I was not advised as to what was contemplated by the change.

Mr. SCOTT. There was employed under the title of "executive assistant" a gentleman who was paid a salary of $1,800 a year from a lump sum. The position is now transferred to the statutory roll in accordance with the law, at the same salary.

Mr. MALBY. I want to inquire of the gentleman whether there was heretofore an officer in the Plant Industry Department designated and known and called an "executive assistant in grain investigations?"

Mr. SCOTT. There was not on the statutory roll. There was an employee so designated, who was carried under the lump fund.

Mr. MALBY. And under that title?

Mr. SCOTT. I find upon examination of the estimates that the title is not exactly the same. The person who is now transferred from the lump sum under the title of "one executive assistant in grain investigations" was carried on the lump sum of the Bureau of Plant Industry simply under the title of "executive assistant," and I presume the words "in grain investigations" were added to more particularly designate the work he was expected to do; but it is not a new position.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in making the point of order with reference to these matters, briefly, was with reference to this particular subject which we now have under consideration. I hardly know or fully appreciate what the department intends to do with an assistant to investigate grain. If I was advised as to whether that was intended as a new departure on the part of the Government, or simply following out the work which they are now doing, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] assures me, and it is not now intended to change the character of the business in which he is employed, of course that is one proposition. But if they intend to create a new bureau or a new officer, having the power to investigate the subject of grain, then that might become important to us all.

Mr. SCOTT. The work which this gentleman will assist in has been carried on for several years under the authority of the paragraph on page 16, line 22, which reads:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof.

That work has been carried on for several years, and it is not intended under the authority of any paragraph of this bill to take up new work in that line.

Mr. MALBY. I would like to inquire as to the clerks mentioned on page 14, line 4, 31 clerks——

The CHAIRMAN. For the Chair's information, will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] call the attention of the Chair to the statute under which transfers are authorized of the clerks that are carried under the lump sum to the statutory roll.

Mr. SCOTT. I will endeavor to present the statute to the Chair in a moment.

Answering directly the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] in regard to the 31 clerks, messengers, or laborers——

Mr. MALBY. How does the transfer take place?

Mr. SCOTT. There was an increase in the number formerly carried on this statutory roll of 15 altogether, 14 by transfer from the lump sum for general expenses of the department, and one in lieu of one assistant topographer who was dropped.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman inform us as to whether the former employees were under the civil service?

Mr. SCOTT. They are all in the civil service except some scientific employees.

Mr. MALBY. Were they in the civil service that were paid under the lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. There are no employees in the department except those engaged in scientific work that are not under the civil service.

Mr. MALBY. Are these employees under the lump-sum appropriation who have been dropped and transferred as clerks without any increase of salary?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the true status of the affair.

Mr. BOWERS. May I call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this: I understand him to say that the executive assistants in grain investigation had been, by reason of the appropriation contained in lines 22 to 24, on the bottom of page 16, "investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $51,020." Was that the lump-sum appropriation from which these executive assistants had heretofore been paid?

Mr. SCOTT. That is my understanding; the note in the estimates is to that effect, "for 61 places created, $43,200 has been added by transfer from lump sum as follows," and the first that follows is two executive assistants in grain investigation, at $1,800 each.

Mr. BOWERS. There is a reduction from $52,440 to $51,020. That is not a reduction commensurate with the transfer of the two $1,800 clerks. It amounts to a reduction of $1,430, as against the transfer of two men at $1,800, making a total of $3,600.

Mr. SCOTT. That would seem to make it clear that these salaries must have been paid from some other lump sum; but just at this moment I am not able to answer from which one they were paid.

Mr. Chairman, in answer to the inquiry of the Chair, I am not able at the moment to lay my hand upon the statute which I thought existed providing for the transfer of employees from a lump fund to a statutory roll at the expiration of a year, and it may be that I was mistaken as to that, simply for the reason that it has been the practice of the committee to require the Secretary in presenting his estimate to transfer to statutory rolls all employees who have been engaged upon the same line of work under any lump-sum fund for the period of a year. That practice may have misled me into the thought that it was a statutory requirement. I trust, however, that if the point of order might lie the gentleman from New York will not press it, because I am quite sure he will agree with me that it is in the interest of good administration and good appropriation to have as many employees as possible carried on statutory rolls, and it was for that purpose that the Committee on Agriculture has insisted upon these transfers.

Mr. MALBY. I would like to ask the gentleman just another question, and it is if these men have been employed all the time during the past year or only temporarily employed?

Mr. SCOTT. All the time from the day they were engaged. They may not all have been engaged at the beginning of the fiscal year and fully employed as they are now, all the time, but there has been no transfer of any employee who has not been employed at least a year.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to be captious in this matter. If these men are already in the employ of the department at this rate of wages, and they are necessary for the proper conduct of the affairs of the department, and it does not create new offices, with new powers, duties, and responsibilities, why, I am not disposed to embarrass the department or the committee, either. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I withdraw the point of order, on the explanation of the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the statement, upon my responsibility as a Member of the House and chairman of this committee, that there has not been a new place created nor a salary increased in this bill from beginning to end.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Plant Industry: For all necessary expenses in the investigation of fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, tobacco, vegetables, grasses, forage, drug, medicinal, poisonous, fiber, and other plants and plant industries, in cooperation with other branches of the department, the state experiment stations, and practical farmers: for rent and repairs in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and for the employment of all investigators, local and special agents, agricultural explorers, experts, clerks, illustrators, assistants, and all labor and other necessary expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere required for the investigations, experiments, and demonstrations herein authorized, as follows:

Mr. MACON. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have had so many suggestions made to me by Members that I was perhaps overlooking this bill that I have concluded that maybe I ought to state to the committee that I have been through every paragraph of it, word by word, and have noted every new word—yes, every new letter in it even—and I have discovered in my examination of it that it is one of the cleanest appropriation bills that has been presented to the House since I have been a Member of it. [Applause.] And as I did not think there was a single provision in it that was not beneficial to the agricultural interests of the country, and knowing that the world depends upon agricultural interests for its subsistence, I have not felt that it was necessary for me to take up the time of the committee to retard its enactment into law by asking questions about it.

Mr. Chairman, I deem it highly necessary to watch appropriation bills, and I assure this House that I am going to watch them, whether I take the floor to object to any of their provisions or not. The House can rest assured that my eye will rest upon all of the paragraphs of all the appropriation bills that are presented to it for consideration, and that I have come to the conclusion that every provision carried in them is proper legislation or I would take the floor and oppose them. [Applause.] I believe this is a clean bill. It looks that way to me, and I do not propose to fight clean measures. [Applause.]

For the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, $16,510.

Mr. SHARP. I move to strike out the last word. Notwithstanding the welcome and reassuring words of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON], it may be that he has not sufficiently scrutinized all of these paragraphs. I notice in the paragraph beginning in line 21, on page 15, a reference to the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs. I wish to know whether the investigation for which this bill is providing has concerned itself with what in common parlance we call "tree surgery," as distinguished from merely combating the insect enemies of shrubs and trees, San Jose scale and other pests. In this connection I wish to read from a letter that I received the other day from a constituent of mine who has had a great deal of experience in this particular line of what is called "tree surgery." I read this because I think it may be of special interest to some Members of the House. This gentleman, who has had a lifetime of experience in horticulture and arboreal work, writes as follows:

I have had occasion to go through many of the national cemeteries in the South and East within recent years, and have naturally been observant of conditions there. To say that the trees and shrubbery are in an alarming condition is expressing the literal truth. Numerous stumps, large and small, hideous in themselves, bear mute testimony to the destructive effects of decay. Many beautiful trees are now decaying in trunk and branch, and will within a very short time, unless intelligently treated and at once, be merely stumps. The deadly scale, in all its numerous forms, is at work on both trees and shrubs, and is yearly killing more and more of our finest specimens.

I will not go into the details of the effects of the scale, decay, and other diseases of vegetation, nor of the remedies therefor. Suffice it to say that the diseases mentioned are prevalent in every national cemetery in the country; are deadly, though often slow, and that the keepers of these cemeteries, though generally willing, without exception lack the knowledge necessary to enable them to combat the conditions.

You are, doubtless, somewhat familiar with the results of modern "tree surgery." The principles are practically the same as in dentistry—the treatment similar and the results as positive and satisfactory. Trees decayed in trunk or limb, which, a few years since, were regarded as doomed, may be made as sound and healthy as ever, with new bark and new wood grown over the wound.

While the observations made by the writer just quoted have to do with conditions observed by him in our national cemeteries, yet it would seem to me the question I ask is especially pertinent as applying to the provisions of the bill under discussion. I believe that a certain amount of valuable information has already been issued by the Government in the form of bulletins upon the subject of the proper care of diseased and decaying trees, but I would be glad to know how wide is the scope of the work laid out by this bureau in reference to instructing the public, disseminating literature and using such care of trees under the supervision and control of the Government.

It is because I have reaped no little advantage from a personal experience in a practical demonstration of what this comparatively new method of so-called "tree surgery" will accomplish that I will be glad to have this useful work extended as widely as possible. It seems to me that the proper care of our beautiful shrubs and trees in city and country is indeed one of the most approved forms of the preservation, as well as conservation, of our natural resources.

I want to ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge whether there has been any special effort made along these lines, as distinguished from combatting the scale and insects, which tend to destroy shrubs and trees?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know of any work that has been done along the line to which the gentleman particularly calls attention. The language of this paragraph authorizes this department to conduct investigations for the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, and undoubtedly whatever research they make in any portion of the country would be useful in cambating the diseases of schrubs and forest trees anywhere else in the country.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will excuse me, I think Doctor Galloway can give him the information he desires in a bulletin with reference to tree surgery. I think he can furnish that information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to add a little bit of testimony to what has been vouchsafed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP].

About two years ago a practical lumberman in my State happened to go through Arlington National Cemetery, and he wrote me later stating that the condition of the trees there was anything but complimentary to a modern and up-to-date system of forestry. I was so much impressed with the correctness of his criticism that I caused this letter to be transmitted to the bureau, and they wrote me thanking me for it and saying that they would take steps to cure some of those conditions. Whether they have done so or not I do not know, as I have not sufficient knowledge of forestry to be able to judge, but certainly there has been in the past considerable lack of proper attention to the trees and shrubs in some of our national cemeteries and other grounds owned by the Government.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, the result of the work that has been done for me by competent tree surgeons on my own place in preserving shrubs and trees has been of such marked benefit that I wish everybody could know of those results and follow the plans there adopted.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman know whether a bulletin has been published by the department upon this subject?

Mr. SHARP. I do not think there has.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was not speaking of any lack of knowledge, but of a lack of application of that knowledge to specific cases.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of growing, producing, and handling tobacco, $22,330.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that there is here an apparent reduction of $850 from the appropriation of last year. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if that is caused by the transfer of any clerk to the statutory list, or is it a real reduction?

Mr. SCOTT. What language does the gentleman refer to?

For the investigation and improvement of methods of growing and handling tobacco, $22,330.

Mr. SCOTT. The reduction was made, as the gentleman suggests, by a transfer to the statutory roll of one employee.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am gratified to know that there is no reduction made in the appropriation, because it is my purpose to offer an amendment increasing the appropriation in the sum of $1,800. I move to strike out, in lines 19 and 20, the words "twenty-two thousand three hundred and thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four thousand one hundred and thirty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "twenty-two thousand three hundred and thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four thousand one hundred and thirty."

Mr. BYRNS. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word to explain my object in offering the amendment. The work which has been done under the appropriations that have been made for this purpose in the past has been for the four States of Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and North Carolina. The work consists of examining fertilizers, examining soil, and making recommendations of the kind of tobacco best suited for the soil. The work also consists in making experiments in the rotation of crops in order that the soil may be preserved from year to year. I am informed that the work has been very beneficial wherever it has been carried on.

Now, there are counties in Tennessee and Kentucky, consisting of fifteen or twenty, known as the "black patch," in which dark tobacco is grown. There is no station or substation in that locality. The substation or station located in Kentucky is in Bowling Green, in the Burley district. I believe that inasmuch as the work of the department in this respect has been so beneficial in other communities that Congress ought to appropriate enough money to establish a substation in the dark-tobacco district.

I say that, Mr. Chairman, because I believe there is no class of citizens who are more entitled to consideration by Congress than the tobacco growers of this country. Not only is this true because of the revenue that is produced to the Government by reason of the crops, but also because of the fact that for many years the price of tobacco was forced down below the cost of production, for the reason that the tobacco growers were in the hands of a gigantic and merciless trust. I believe that that condition was largely brought about by the fact that Congress failed to enact the necessary legislation which the tobacco growers were demanding from year to year; also by the inaction and failure of the Department of Justice to institute suits to dissolve the trust. I am informed by the Department of Agriculture that $1,800 would be sufficient money to institute a substation, and if the department, in its judgment, thinks the substation ought to be located in the district I have mentioned $1,800 will be enough for that purpose. The department informs me that they made the estimate of $22,330 simply for the purpose of carrying on the work now in operation, and it does not contemplate any extension. I hope the committee will accept the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt the Department of Agriculture, like a great many other departments of our Government, could establish stations in aid of a great many other agricultural products besides that of tobacco. But I submit that inasmuch as we are appropriating the amounts that we are now and have heretofore appropriated for this particular line of agricultural industry, there is no reason why it should be extended to every community which is engaged in the business of raising tobacco. In fact, I can not see any justification for discriminating between the tobacco raiser and the wheat raiser; and there are a great many more raising wheat than tobacco

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to ask if this bill does not carry in it an appropriation of $51,020 for the purpose of investigating and handling the transportation of grain, and if there is not another considerable appropriation made for the purpose of investigating the growing and baling of cotton?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; there is. But the appropriation in regard to grading and handling of grain is not for the purpose of instructing the farmers how to prepare the soil for the raising of grain. It is not for the purpose of instructing the farmers as to what kind of crops should follow one year after another, raised on a particular piece of ground, to preserve the soil for the purpose of raising any particular agricultural product. Mr. Chairman, I think that we are going to the full extent in the appropriation carried in this bill for investigative research along the lines of agriculture, and I do not believe there is any justification for thus increasing the appropriation as proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], unless you want to go into the wholesale business of taking over every farm and every farmer in the United States, one by one, and providing a sufficient force to each farm or instruct the farmers generally how to raise crops and treat the soil. I do not think we are justified in going into the business any further. I sincerely hope that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment should not prevail. I listened with some attention to the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] about this bill, and was somewhat surprised at it. I have looked at this bill somewhat carefully, and I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas that it is a vast improvement on the bill of last year. Last year the bill as reported carried more money than the department estimated was necessary to carry on the work of the Department of Agriculture. This bill is an improvement over that for the current year in that it carries only the exact amount that the Secretary of the department has estimated is necessary for his department.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I can not allow the gentleman's statement to go unchallenged, that the bill as reported last year carried a larger amount than was estimated. It carried a million and a half less than was estimated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. O, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman and myself discussed that last year. Requests were made by the department for appropriations which the gentleman insisted were estimates. I think I succeeded in pointing out to him that they were not estimates, and the requests were prohibited by law. My recollection is that the estimates which were made as the law required were about one million and a half less than the amount actually recommended by the committee in the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman must admit that there was only a technical difference between the "requests," as he states them, and the estimates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. O, Mr. Chairman, every time a Republican official violates the law somebody on that side of the House defends it on the theory that it is only a technical violation of the law. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] to the fact that the state prisons of this country are full of men who have been guilty only of a "technical" violation of the law, and that if the same rigorous rule were applied to this Republican administration I am afraid there would hardly be a high official in it that would not now be serving some place else rather than as an official of the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, the department asks for the particular purpose named in the pending paragraph $22,330. It is all that the department wanted, because if this department desired more it would not have hesitated a moment to ask for more than it has. The committee, with its usual liberality, gave the exact sum that was asked. Now, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON], representing 11 great counties in that State, devoted wholly to agriculture, might very readily believe that this bill was a perfect bill, since it gave the Department of Agriculture every penny that was asked for by the Department of Agriculture; and yet, Mr. Chairman, after an experience of some years on a committee which appropriates money, I have never yet found a department submit estimates for appropriations which did not in doing so include some estimates that it never hoped to get, but simply included them so that if they were cut out the department would not be hampered, and the committee would be complimented upon reducing the amount asked. This committee, it seems, Mr. Chairman, with the approbation of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. MACON], has not even been able to ascertain the particular appropriations that the department requested, merely to enable the committee to make a record in economy, and in some instances I am sure it has received more money for some purposes, not only than it merely hoped to get, but than it could usefully employ.

Mr. SCOTT. Can the gentleman specify any?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas that debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in three minutes.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas to allow me one moment in which to reply to the reference made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to myself.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate close in five minutes, and I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the gentleman from New York has undertaken to question my humble judgment in regard to the good qualities of this bill. I think I have fought extravagant appropriations here as much, perhaps, as the gentleman from New York. I realize that the agricultural appropriation bill is the most important one that comes before this House, and I do not even except the one which appropriates my own salary. [Applause.] And inasmuch as agriculture is the greatest industry in the country, inasmuch as it stands out head and shoulders above every other enterprise or calling in the country, I think it bad taste for anyone to question the committee's action when it is only appropriating the amount that the department deemed necessary to carry on its great work of experiment and investigation for the next fiscal year. Mr. Chairman, if there were any increases of salaries or other extravagances in the bill, it would be different, but as it is, it simply provides for a proper enlargement of the powers of the Agricultural Department, to the end that it can do a greater and better work for the agricultural interests of the country than it has heretofore been able to do. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the work appropriated for under this paragraph has been carried on for several years with approximately the same amount of money, and the character of the work is such that results can be obtained with the amount provided in this paragraph practically equivalent to the results that might be obtained by the addition of the small sum of $1,800. The chief of the bureau, in presenting the estimates, did not ask for any more. There will be just as much available for this work in the next fiscal year as there is in the current fiscal year, and I think the committee would certainly not be warranted in increasing the amount.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas if the work that has been done under this appropriation in the past has not been limited to certain sections of the country?

Mr. SCOTT. It has been limited to sections where tobacco is grown.

Mr. BYRNS. But has it not been limited to certain sections of the tobacco-growing districts—I mean certain particular sections?

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BYRNS. And I would also like to ask the gentleman if the estimates submitted by the Department of Agriculture for this particular appropriation do not contemplate simply a continuance of the work in those sections where this work has been done heretofore and not an extension of that work?

Mr. SCOTT. It contemplates the expending of $22,330 for the investigation and improvement of methods of growing, producing, and handling tobacco at such places and in such manner as the chief of the bureau, under authority of the Secretary, may direct. I ask for a vote, and I trust that the House will not approve of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $130,060.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, in line 14, amend by striking out the word "one" and inserting the word "two," so as to read "$230,060" instead of "$130,060."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, there is a very great increase in the demand for work of this kind all over the country. This is an authorization for farmers' institute work, for expert agricultural teachers to go over the country and cooperate with the States for the purpose of educating the people of the country in the different methods of agriculture. Now the Secretary of Agriculture says that the demand for this work is so great that the present appropriation is not equal to it and that it will require more money to do the work that is called for. Now, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the conditions of to-day especially demand the providing of work of this sort. The activity in the farming interest is very great all over the land at this time, resulting, of course, from the higher price of farm products and the improved conditions of the farmer.

And this increased prosperity that has come in many ways to the farmer has developed this lively interest, and they are intensely interested in all improvement resulting from scientific research and experimental work. They want to learn all about improved methods. They want to avail themselves of the scientific researches which have been made by the Government, and this can be given to them most readily by the cooperation of the Government and the state authorities in sending expert teachers to hold institutes and discuss all the best methods and to set out the knowledge gained by the experimental work and the scientific research made by the Department of Agriculture.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we hear much said about the farmers being the support of the country in peace and its defense in war. We all know this is true. Now, here is an opportunity to give the farmer a reasonable kind of assistance—that is, education. This is what they ask for, and this is a reasonable demand. We hear the old maxim that "that man is a public benefactor who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before," and this we all admit. If this reasonable demand for education, for light and knowledge along this subject, is granted, you provide a way for our farmers to thus become benefactors to the whole country. I think it is but just and fair to make this appropriation to supply a larger amount that will give to the farmers of the country information that will so much benefit them and, in benefiting them, be a blessing to all. We hear a great deal said about the congestion of the cities and about the young men of the country leaving the farms. Just now they seem to be growing more interested in farming, and at this time they are turning more readily to the farm. They want to make development along this line, and there is no appropriation that can be made by the Government that will be more deserving and be more beneficial to the whole country than this.

I trust the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the proposition, as I understand the gentleman offering the amendment, is to increase the appropriation carried in the bill from $130,060 to $230,060. It is a laudable thing to encourage farming and farm methods.

This is a very general clause in the bill, and it provides an appropriation to investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice. I presume that there has been something done in that line in the past, but I rather agree with the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that we can not encourage farm methods and farm practices all over the great domain of the United States. There are a good many things that farmers could learn, I agree, but these things will not be learned simply by appropriations of this character.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, of reading a very touching instance of Puritan times in New England. A Puritan preacher, in going about his circuit, one Saturday evening reached the place where he was to preach on the following day. The prospect of crops among the farmers at that time and place was not good. There had been droughts, and he was met by a petition signed by the members of his church asking him to pray Almighty God on the following day for rain. He assented to do what the petition asked him to do, and at the proper time in his Sabbath-day service, with his petition before him on the pulpit, he said in substance:

O Lord, as I am requested by this good congregation, I now pray for rain upon the lands of these poor people of my parish; but, O Lord, Thou knowest, as I know, and as these people ought to know, that what is wanted here is deeper plowing, better dressing, and more manure.

[Laughter.]

And that is what we ought to encourage by lecturing to the farming people of this country, and thereby get better results. We will not accomplish it by mere money appropriations of this kind.

That is all I have now to say. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this amendment close in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that debate on this amendment close in three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to consume more than three minutes in suggesting to the House the reason why this amendment should not prevail. We all agree most potently and powerfully with the remarks that have been made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] in support of the amendment, as to the desirability of the work which is being done under this paragraph. But it does not follow that because $100,000 worth of work is desirable $200,000 worth of it would be twice as desirable. As the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table remarked in one of his charming volumes, "Because I like a salt-water plunge at Nahant, it does not follow that I want to be pickled in brine." The work that is being done under this paragraph is bringing great results, and the amount asked for is all that the Secretary thought could be profitably used for that purpose during the coming year. I trust therefore that the report of the committee will be sustained and the amendment voted down.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there has been work of this kind done——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think time for debate has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one minute remaining.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to say this: That there has been work of this kind done, and the chairman recognized its useful character and the benefit of the work that has been done in portions of the country. Some sections have had this work and reaped important benefit from it. There are other sections that have not had any of this work done, and they are asking for it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it would be impossible with an appropriation of $1,000,000 to meet all the demands for this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $215,155.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out on page 18, line 17, after the word "weevil," all of said line, and all of line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in presenting that amendment I realize well the lack of specific acquaintance with the necessity for it arising from the want of general knowledge among gentlemen who are not acquainted with the conditions obtaining in the cotton belt of America. When it is viewed in connection with the great value of that commodity the contrast is in the reverse order. As I stated yesterday, or the day before, in presenting a memorial of the Farmers' Union of Mississippi, in some remarks, submitted in a very limited time, the value of that great commodity, which constitutes our greatest agricultural staple in the South, is national in its character. In fact, I believe we are the only people on the earth to-day possessing, strictly speaking, a national crop of international importance to the extent that this is. England, with all her prowess, with India upon which to draw, has failed. Combining her inexhaustible treasury with the fertility of the Nile Valley in which to operate, she has failed to produce but 21 per cent of the world's output. Sixty-six and four-tenths per cent of that commodity that enters as the fabric in the raiment of the children of men is grown on the North American Continent, in thirteen and a fraction States thereof. Now, my friends, the supremacy of America in the production of this great fiber is threatened, a threat with which you who do not live in that section are not acquainted by reason of the fact of distant residence from the fields in which it is produced. Now, $500,000 seems at the first glance a very considerable amount. Permit me to say right in that connection that something over $400,000 is carried in this bill more than last year, and is for the purchase of 26,000,000 acres of land to go into the forest reserves, which can be paid for 100 times by the loss of cotton in the State of Louisiana alone in the last two years. In my own district, which has scarcely yet been touched, five counties have suffered in the last year to the extent of $5,538,560. My own county, in which I have lived every instant of my days, did not produce this year one bale of cotton per mule the county over. The first meeting that I attended on my return from the last session of Congress was a mass meeting to devise ways and means to discharge taxes in that county, a meeting compelled by the ravages of this insidious pest.

Now, can we handle this question? I say, without reservation, that I take off my hat to Doctor Knapp and his corps of assistants and to the distinguished head of the Department of Entomology. I believe that in every field wherein they demonstrated they have brought forth twofold when compared with those fields where the government experiments were not conducted. But can we handle it as the State of Texas has so successfully done? That is the problem which confronts us and awaits us. It is yet to be seen. The distinguished chairman of the committee said wisely yesterday that we had unknown local questions to solve and that it was local features largely that meet us with this stubborn resistance. We know that owing to the umbrageous character of our country, its humidity, and its vast forests, it provides the best hibernating places possible and conditions most conducive to weevil destructiveness. We have that question to solve. Permit me to say that the destructiveness of that insect after it passed into Louisiana and came to Mississippi has been far greater and more persistent this season than anywhere else yet discovered.

Another element that enters into the proposition and contributes to the difficulty in its solution, as compared with Texas, is that in that great Commonwealth 85 per cent of this fabric——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Can we handle it as the State of Texas handled it? That awaits, Mr. Chairman, to be seen. Eighty-five per cent of the cotton grown in that great Commonwealth, an empire in its extent and character and qualities of every feature and phase, is raised by an intelligent, economic people; a population made up by those who are capable of exercising all the attributes of the best manhood which may be had by the mingling blood of Missouri and Mississippi, Ohio and Iowa, with the intelligence and virtue of every section of our country contributing to make up the people of the Lone Star State.

The reverse condition obtains in my State, Mississippi. Sixty-seven per cent of the cotton there is grown by a noneconomical, nonindustrious, thriftless class of negroes who repel, rather than invite, the assistance of science, whom as our wards we are endeavoring to assist. Now, this demonstration which is necessary to improve these conditions will, in my judgment, yield a greater return for the money expended than any other field in which a like amount can be employed. Louisiana in the last two years has lost $56,000,000 and in the last three years nearly $90,000,000. Six of the nine counties in my district are seriously affected, and 36 counties in my State are reported infected. In the language of Doctor Knapp, I violate no confidence in saying that he said to me:

Mr. DICKSON, I indorse the policy, I indorse the procedure of the committee and their recommendations. I have been absent and did not testify, but if I had $10,000 more with which to extend aid to the people in Mississippi, I would benefit you more than a million of dollars.

Now, gentlemen, I worked with that distinguished head of the division which has in charge the destruction of this pest. He is faithful, and so are those employed under him. I ask this assistance as a meed of justice, as a business proposition that reaches in influence from Mississippi to Massachusetts. The hum of every spindle in your Commonwealth and in the Carolinas is threatened by an overhanging menace that I fear you do not realize. There is not a railway or steamship line or a factory that renders this fabric into cloth that is not interested in this appropriation.

My countrymen, my own county alone this year lost absolutely more by double than this appropriation sought to be given to save an industry to name whose value requires figures necessary to express a billion dollars. I trust that in speaking thus in behalf of the second greatest product in our agricultural economy, which affects every other business interest in this broad land, I have not sought too much at your hands; not in prodigality, but as the representative of a provident Government. I have only sought justice for a needy, deserving, and patriotic people. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I could add anything to what my distinguished colleague [Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi] has just said on this subject, which means so much to our people.

I fear that many of the Members of this House view this question with some indifference, because they feel that the people of our section are unnecessarily frightened about the matter. But my colleague has not overdrawn the picture. The question for this House to determine now is whether or not a great industry, which amounts to over $800,000,000 annually, shall be preserved and saved to the Nation or whether you will take the chance of losing the larger part of this great industry.

Every calamity that befalls a people throughout the world has always appealed to this Government, and has never appealed in vain. Now, the portion of this country that is being threatened with this great destruction is so threatened because of the fact that we have been unable, up to date, to handle the situation, because no scientist has yet been able to determine a method for the destruction of the Mexican boll weevil. It then becomes necessary that some instruction be given to those people to whom my distinguished colleague has called your attention, who perform the greater part of the labor in the cotton field, to enable them, under proper instruction from the Government, to cultivate their crops so as to make the maximum amount of cotton with the boll weevil there. If this instruction is not given to this ignorant negro labor in Mississippi, Alabama, and the other States in which the boll weevil is rapidly appearing, it will only be a question of a few years, as I stated to you the other day on this floor, when this great industry will be absolutely destroyed.

Now, as my colleague has told you, this crop is one in which every spindle in New England is interested; every spindle in the Carolinas, Virginia, and Georgia is interested; every man engaged in any business is interested, because more than $500,000,000 in gold annually comes to our shores from all the world to take away this raw cotton, and the balance of trade is in our favor because of the fact that the foreign buyers come to carry cotton away, and it is the one crop which of all the crops we raise the whole world must come to the South for. If this industry is destroyed, the balance of trade will be against the people of the United States. Is it possible that this great Government, with all its scientific knowledge, is willing to give up the fight? Are we willing now to surrender and say we will stop the work that we have commenced and let a little insect one-quarter of an inch long and one-sixteenth of an inch wide defy all of the scientists of this great Government, or shall we continue until we save this great industry? [Applause.]

It is not an exaggerated picture; the only thing necessary to do is to go and see what ravages are being made in the cotton fields. And, gentlemen of the House, when economy is to be practiced, let it be practiced with some judgment and in those departments where the extravagances are so rank and flagrant and where such extravagances result in absolutely no good. Why not cut off a few millions from the army appropriations and from the navy appropriations and enable all the farmers throughout the country to get the proper instruction and proper information necessary to handle this situation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there are a great many things I want to say about this agricultural bill, but my time is limited, and I can not discuss it as freely as I would like. I want especially to call the attention of the House to some features of the bill in which my people are greatly interested and in which, as I am informed, the people throughout all the South and West are interested.

The Agricultural Department has been doing some demonstration work, which has resulted in a great deal of good to the farmers in my section of the country. That department furnished me three men last summer, and we made a tour of my district, and we had from 1,000 to 5,000 farmers at each meeting. The interest was such that I was fully convinced that the work was not only appreciated by the farmers, but that it was doing great good.

My understanding is that the amount appropriated for this purpose is not sufficient to do all the work of this kind which should be done; not even enough to do that which the farmers of the country have asked the department to do.

They have seen the great need of instruction in the best methods of farming, and are now beginning to appreciate how necessary it is that the farmer be able to farm against the seasons and make crops in spite of bad seasons.

The Agricultural Department, as has been shown by my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], has spent less in the sixty-nine years of its existence than the appropriations for the army and navy now is for one single year. A great proportion of this vast army and navy expense is paid directly into the pockets of the steel trust. The steel trust controls the steel plants which manufacture the vast steel plates for our battle ships, and it gets millions of dollars annually out of these great government contracts. The steel trust is agitating a great navy. Why? It answers itself. The beef trust feeds the army and navy and therefore wants a big army and navy. The powder trust sells powder to the big army and navy, therefore they are for the hundreds of millions of dollars appropriated. These great influences can pry open the Treasury of the United States, because they are in control of the Republican party, and this party now controls the Treasury. When they make a demand upon the Treasury, the doors fly wide open. They can demand that bonds be issued and sold to raise money to buy their wares, and it is done. The trusts can have their products protected by a high tariff against foreign competition and force the Government to compel the farmers and laborers to pay them tribute in the form of artificially high prices for the necessities of life, and all such legislation is called by the subsidized press of the Republican party "wise" and "conservative" legislation. But when a Democrat pleads for the suffering farmers of the South and West, and asks that the Agricultural Department be placed in a position to extend the "farm demonstration work," this same Republican party gets to be very economical and they begrudgingly give a mere pittance for this work, which is intended to save the greatest crop of America, and say that they want the counties and States to do this work. Is it not refreshing to hear a Republican talk about economy and the States doing things? No farmer's petition is ever heard by these servants of the trust magnates.

They can see the boll weevil devastate our crops, our soil wearing out, our ignorant negro farmers, whose friend and protector this same Republican party claims to be, whose vote they always get and can rely on in close States, and who can not farm upon improved methods, wasting their energies, and when the southern farmer asks for a few additional dollars for the extension of the demonstration work in the South, he is told that he can not get it, because we are cutting down appropriations now. A city on the other side of the globe has a disaster, and off go ships of money and food for the stricken city. But the southern cotton farmer, who contributes more to the wealth of the country than any other class of people in proportion to what he gets, can be stricken with drought and devastated by storms and confronted with boll weevil, and he only asks that demonstration farm work be given to his neighborhood, the land furnished by the farmer himself, the team and plow, tools, seed, and land all furnished, he only wants a trained and educated agriculturist to come and show him how to prepare his land, when and what to plant, and how to work it, and the Government is too poor. Thus it has ever been, and will ever be as long as the Republicans control the Government. The trusts put up their campaign funds, and they must pay the debt they owe the trusts first. You will find a few Republicans who think that they are opposed to the trusts, but they are in Congress in a hopeless minority and they are permitted to register a kick and make a fuss, but when they yield an inch for the demand of the people for reforms in government and present abuses and unholy privileges, it is to keep in power, and as soon as elected their Presidents deliver messages and hold out hope, but it never ends in fruition.

They all, like Roosevelt, thunder in the index, but when it comes to the pinch they back off and the trust barons have their will. Look at the merger of the steel trust and the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company, a direct violation of law, and Roosevelt, "the great trust buster," did not only not prevent it, but justified this violation of law. Great trust magnates and the President can violate the law, but not the laborer. If a laborer even criticises the decision of the court, even when defending his right of free speech, he is placed in jail at the behest of the trust barons. Now, I do not think that a laborer ought to violate an injunction, but I know that the President, who is sworn to execute federal statutes, is guilty of a crime when he aids and abets others in violating a statute. This example is worse in its effect upon the people than is the immediate result of the violated law. How can you appeal to the masses to respect law when the President has a contempt for it and the rich and powerful violate it daily and hourly and are not punished?

I saw a cartoon the other day in Puck which illustrated exactly the condition under Republican rule. The law was represented as a sieve over the penitentiary, and the meshes were small and all criminals were thrown against the law, and all the big trust magnates were caught in the meshes, because they were too large to get into the holes in the sieve, and were thus saved by the law, but all the small fellows, the laborers and those keeping the books and working for these big scoundrels, were shot through the holes in the sieve and into the penitentiary, there to serve a term of hard labor for crime.

This is a condition brought about in this country by Republican rule. There was never a people who were so badly exploited by the rich and with such impunity as are the American people by the rich under this Republican régime. They sit in both ends of the Capitol feeling conscious of their security and with full confidence in the belief that they can bunco the people again. The trust magnates feel their security, because they have Senators and Congressmen who are in control of the party, sent here by their own hard cash, and they chuck each other in the ribs and say with a smile, "We are all right." They hear one high in authority say, "There are good trusts and there are some bad trusts," and that you can make all trusts good by "bringing them into the zone of lawfulness." You hear the hoarse and awful laugh of all the steel, sugar, railroad, and copper kings making a hell chorus in their fiendish joy. With one voice we hear the devilish shout, "We knew that he was all right. To hell with your Sherman antitrust law. Our Republicans played the game well. They told us that they knew their man. Golly, he's a great improvement on the other. He's a corker. He's all right. He's so smooth and so quiet about it. He's the man to amend the Sherman antitrust law, which is now about to be enforced against us." Thus all the men who profit by criminal operations of their corporate institutions reason about the situation, and they know that they will not have to suffer personally for their criminal acts, for which they should be in the penitentiary; but they, under such magnificent and diplomatic leadership, will be conducted into a safe harbor in the "zone of lawfulness," and the people will be fed on promises, to be forgotten as soon as the election is over. Thus it is from election to election, and it will always be so until we turn the rascals out.

BROKEN PLEDGES.

My old farmer friend, Evan Britt, of Montgomery County, Miss., thus states the proposition in his verses on "Broken pledges:"

I've almost despaired of that promised relief
For which I have so long been yearning,
And nothing prevents me from yielding to grief,
But that I am living and learning.

I find to my grief I have trusted in vain
The doctrine of the demagogue preaches,
And that the best knowledge a man can obtain
Is that which necessity teaches.

John Sherman, the boasted financial expert,
By raising the price of a dollar,
Compels me to cut off the tail of my shirt
To get cloth to make me a collar.

McKinley, not mending the matter at all,
By raising the price of apparel
Compels me to stand with my back to the wall
And poke my head in a barrel.

Then comes the bold Teddy, all combines to bust,
And have traffic fairly adjusted;
The nearest he came to busting a trust
Was busting the people who trusted.

And then he suggested Bill Taft as the man
To send the trust magnates to prison,
Which proves to be only a concerted plan
For Bill "to get sugar in his'n."

The idle still feast on the fat of the land,
Though Taft on his promise is winner,
While I have for breakfast a tight bellyband,
A Republican promise for dinner.

He promised the negro, in order to gain
His suffrage, a lucrative job,
But when he got in he took all the grain
And proffered the negro the cob.

He next pledged the miner a full dinner pail,
With plenty of beer and "tobacker;"
Said miner has witnessed those promises fail
As his pants have grown slacker and slacker.

Though promising generally that times would be good
And the laborer revel in riches,
Said laborer stands as he formerly stood,
With a patch on the seat of his breeches.

I've hung on to that promised prosperity line,
Awaiting a feast and a frolic,
Till my stomach is drawn so close to my spine
I have no room for the colic.

The seers and preachers have ever avowed
'Tis sinful to worry and grumble,
For God in His wisdom resisteth the proud
And freely gives grace to the humble.

But how can I be reconciled to my lot,
Or properly heed this avowal
While Big Bill Taft's paunch is as round as a pot
And mine is as flat as a trowel?

PURPOSE OF AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

The Agricultural Department is a department intended to benefit primarily the farmer—to advance his interest and to help him to become prosperous and independent. It proposes to do this by the proper study of soil improvement and crop cultivation. It proposes to elevate farm life by teaching the farmer how to produce the greatest amount on each acre cultivated. This is a great problem, and it will require all the genius of the great minds of the country to solve the problem correctly. To feed and clothe the increasing millions will be the great problem of the future. Conservation of our forests is a great problem to-day, over which our western friends are quarreling and over which their Congressmen are divided. It has stirred up a row in the President's Cabinet and has caused a split in Republican ranks. But, my friends, there is a conservation that is of greater importance, and that is the conservation of the present fertility of our broad acres. This bill carries over $5,000,000 to care for the forests out West, and the committee is a unit in recommending it; but the committee could see its way clear, for economy's sake, to ask for but $125,000 "to investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice" for the whole country. That is to say, the bill carries over forty times as much to hire rangers to ride and watch forests and government lands as to investigate and discover the best methods of farming and to give the farmers this education. The Government can experiment with this small sum, but who will ever contend that this farm-demonstration work can be carried on with such a small sum?

In all of north Mississippi, with about 40 counties, there is one man who is doing his best; but hundreds of farmers every day are asking him to come and give them some information and to show them how to "break up" and how to cultivate their old and worn soils, and of course he can not get to them. The man whose feet never trod a piece of plowed ground or who has only been through a farm on the train or, in the fall, shooting quail does not know how much there is to learn on a farm. He is of the opinion that it does not take much education to farm, but in this he is mistaken. It requires more good brain to farm properly than to do anything else. If the greatest brain on earth should devote years to the question, it would not make progress very rapidly unless it could gather together the experience of other brains. It must, as Lord Bacon said, be done by experiment; and since a farmer must plant and work by the seasons, he can only tell the result of his experiment once in each year by the harvest. One farmer in one lifetime can make but few experiments. Each farmer, when planting time comes, must plant and plow for bread, and he, of course, will not risk many new experiments, for he can not afford to make a mistake, and therefore farms, in the main, as his father did.

But it is not so with the government experiments. The Government does not make the experiment to make money, but to get information; and after repeated experiments and observations it can ascertain the best method of preparing the soil and working the crop, and, after seeing the good results that flow from a certain method in a certain soil and climate, it can then send this information to the farmers.

The Agricultural Department can send its agents out, and the farmer who desires can get him to come into the neighborhood and at a central farm have a few acres worked under the direction of such agent in accordance with the approved methods, and fifty or a hundred farmers can see the good results and adopt the method. It is the dispensing of information that is expensive, but this is the only value which attaches to information. Oh, you say, "Send out a bulletin." This is good, but it is too slow. The very class of farmers that you want to benefit are perhaps the ones that a bulletin will not reach. But even if the bulletin is put in the hands of all the farmers, it is not half so effective as to see the work done—an actual demonstration. It is easy to tell people how to do things, but so much better to show them how. No amount of books or pamphlets will give a student of medicine as accurate knowledge of the human body as actually seeing one dissected and then doing the dissecting for himself. So it is with farming. When the farmer sees results, he will then act along the lines that produced the results.

But there is no cloud of lobbyists in the galleries to watch the farmer's interest, and he is forgotten. There is no subsidized press to fill the Congressmen's and Senators' mail with demands for him. There are no experts and lawyers standing in line at the Agricultural Committee's door knocking for admittance to plead his cause or his needs. No; he is the one man that is remembered less by a Republican Congress than any other. But as long as I am a member of this body I shall be heard demanding that the farmer be given that which is his right. If every acre of land that is now in cultivation was properly cultivated there would be plenty for all. There would be no hunger and want and poverty. When the farmer is prosperous and has a square deal, all classes are prosperous. Any movement that brings this result is a wise and economical one. It can only be brought about by a wise cultivation of the soil, and this will only be brought about by giving this information to the farmers. I would be glad to see $5,000,000 cut off of the naval and army bills and devoted to this farm demonstration work.

GAMBLING IN COTTON FUTURES.

When my friend from Alabama, TOM HEFLIN, was a member of the Agricultural Committee he was a friend of the farmers, and his eloquent voice was heard on this floor pleading their cause. I suspect that this accounts for his removal from this committee. It is dangerous to be too good a friend to the farmer under this Republican régime. They call a man a dangerous demagogue who stands for the agricultural interest. The cotton gamblers, too, may have had some hand in his removal, but, thank God, they have not stopped his gallant fight against their nefarious business. I gladly join him in this fight, and pledge him that we will never give up the fight until the gambler in agricultural products is put out of business. I want, here and now, to warn this Republican majority in this House and in the other end of the Capitol that the farmer has at last become aroused, and either you must put the gambler in agricultural products out of business or the farmers will put you out of business. [Applause.]

BOLL WEEVIL.

Mr. Chairman, when we reach one section in this bill I hope that the members of the Agricultural Committee will permit an amendment appropriating $500,000 to help the cotton farmers in their fight against the boll weevil. No one has yet made an appeal for these suffering farmers in Louisiana and Mississippi, who now have a new problem to the one presented in Texas on the open plains. I am sure that others of my colleagues will more forcibly and eloquently present this situation than I am able to do. But I want at the very beginning of this discussion to call the attention of the Members to this great calamity which threatens to destroy the cotton industry of the South. And I am sure that you will not be niggardly in your appropriations for this purpose, even though it goes to the South.

IS PRESENT ADMINISTRATION NONSECTIONAL?

Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to digress a little, I want to call attention to one fact, which it seems to me the country ought to know. The present administration laid claim at the outset to being nonsectional and to know no South, East, West, or North, but a one reunited and harmonious Union, and that the music of the Union was to be increased in its harmony and sweetness by a complete recognition of the South and her interest. Has this administration made any progress along this line? Not a man from the cotton States is in his Cabinet. We do not complain at this. But when you look at the Cabinet, it skins very closely along the Canadian line and never turns south except far enough to include the city of Chicago. But this, too, is all right. We do not object. But how about this so-too-much-altogether-absolutely nonpartisan, nonsectional administration? Look at the diplomatic service from the South! The Bureau of Statistics shows that cotton is by far the largest item in the United States foreign trade, and has been for years. It is the one American product that goes to all the ports of the civilized and semicivilized world. But for our cotton our foreign trade would fall to such an extent that the balance of the trade would be against us by hundreds of millions of dollars. Yet, with this vast cotton trade pouring through all the arteries of foreign trade and commerce, when I look over the list of ambassadors and ministers I find that not one of them, certainly not one at a post of the least importance, comes from a southern State—not one from that section of the Union which produces all of the cotton, nearly all of the tobacco, and a vast quantity of the lumber.

Our country is completely ostracized from our diplomatic life, notwithstanding the fact that she contributes by far the largest item to our foreign trade. There is not a Southern man at a single important post to care for or look after this trade. Of course we know that this is a mere accident. Of course we know that it could not have been intentional in this purely nonsectional administration. It is a mere oversight. Of course we all know that a President who so loves the South, and who lies awake at night thinking how he can advance the interest of the South, has simply not had his attention called to this neglect of the South. We are sure that he will hasten to right this injustice and will give the South some foreign representation. While this accident has been happening for years the Southern people have all of a sudden learned how much this administration is in love with them, and they expect at once to see all politics thrown to the winds and the South get her share of the representation in the ports of the world. Of course everybody in the South, with young bird-like simplicity, has gulped down this sort of gush, but no sane and sensible man has ever been thus fooled into the belief that this administration cared a farthing about the South or her interest, except as it might affect its success or failure in the next election. No one would like to see the complete difference between the two sections eliminated more than I would, but this will never be done so long as the South is continued to be ignored. So I am not willing to sugar coat or gloss over the situation just to pander to the same sickly sentimentality which calls for the surrender of all of our sacred principles and our courageous manhood. Let us keep ourselves unspotted from the wiles of a Republicanism which only means to share in the little contemptible spoils of some little office, which can not result in a complete restoration of the Southern States to their dignity and equality of rights, but calls upon every self-respecting white man to concede the right to let numbers control, even though vicious and black.

MATTERS NONPOLITICAL.

But, Mr. Chairman, we do not expect, because of the present political complexion of the administration, to get a square deal in reference to any matter pertaining to any office which is to be appointed by the present administration. But, in view of the fact that the scarcity of food products and the shortness of the cotton crop is a nonpolitical question and is agitating the minds of the people more than any other at this hour, can we not ask this Congress, in considering these appropriations, to ascertain what good can be accomplished by them outside of the South? There is not a factory in New England but that will be benefited by the increased production of cotton per acre in the South. There is not a railroad in the country that will not be benefited by enabling every acre of land to produce its maximum crop with the smallest amount of toil, and to make each acre of land more profitable and more productive than it was before. It has been demonstrated beyond question by all of the agricultural schools and stations throughout the country that there is more mystery wrapped up in a seed, in soil improvement, and crop diversification than was ever dreamed of in early days, and that by an intelligent practice and well-directed education of the farmers throughout the country, enabling them to produce the greatest amount, by a proper preparation and cultivation of the soil, you have benefited every avocation and every human being within the bounds of the Republic.

Governor Roberts, of Texas, on one occasion said in that great State, that all civilization begins and ends with the plow, and this is the literal truth. [Applause.]

I see mighty piles of brick and mortar, the great cities of the world, filled with wealth and with millions of people. Yet, there is not enough food within the bounds of either city to support its population for thirty days. Stop the trains that daily carry farm produce into any one of these great cities, and it is doomed. The city of New York would become a charnel house of death if it were not for the busy farmers who produce the food that keeps alive the millions of that city. [Applause.]

The factory can not run without the farm; the city can not live without the farm. The fires of all the locomotive engines would grow cold and the belching smokestacks cease and the humming looms of the East would be stilled if it were not for the fact that the millions of farmers are producing that by which they live every day. [Applause.] No one denies the fact that the agricultural interest has been wonderfully helped by the manufacturing interest and that the two can not thrive without each endeavoring to promote the interests of the other. I appeal to the people who represent the millions of spindles in New England; and if I can not get you to listen from an unselfish point of view, will you listen from the most selfish point of view? Will you give to the suffering cotton farmers, who are to-day confronted with less than a 10,000,000-bale crop, when last year they produced 13,800,000 bales of cotton, the assistance they need to combat a great evil and calamity with which they are threatened? The progress of the boll weevil, going as it does on an average of 30 miles a year, makes it only a question of a few years, according to the reports of the Agricultural Department, when the mighty production of this great staple will have been reduced, if the ravages are in the future, as they have been in the past, according to the best authority, to not more than 4,000,000 bales for the whole South.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Just a moment more, Mr. Chairman. We appeal to you, then, for the demonstration work that will enable these people to farm against the boll weevil, to farm against the seasons and not with the seasons. Out of all the millions that are paid out of the Treasury for pensions, out of the millions that are paid for other things, the Southland has gotten less in the last forty years, in proportion to her population, than any other section of the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, every Member of the House will concede at once all that has been said by both gentlemen from Mississippi in regard to the importance of the cotton industry to this country, and every Member of the House will deeply sympathize with the conditions that exist in the cotton States, where, on account of the ravages of the boll weevil, the people are in despair because their only industry is threatened with absolute annihilation. The gentlemen have not stated the case too strongly, and it is one which must appeal to the sympathy of every American citizen.

If I believed that the crops of Louisiana and Mississippi and other cotton-growing States of the South could be saved by doubling this appropriation I should not for a moment resist this amendment. If I believed that work could be done which would even meet the expense of the appropriation itself I would not oppose the amendment. But I do not believe the results would be secured from this increased appropriation which the gentlemen anticipate.

Let me state to the membership of the House, if they will bear with me for a moment or two, what has been done and is being done in regard to this matter. It is ten years now since the fight was begun against the boll weevil. In that ten years the Government has expended for this purpose at least $2,000,000—surely a generous contribution for the protection of a single industry. During this current fiscal year, which will end the 30th of next June, there has been available for this work through government appropriation $175,000. We propose during the coming year to increase that to $215,155.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. What was that amount?

Mr. SCOTT. The amount is to be increased to $215,155. The appropriation in last year's bill for this item was $225,000, but $50,000 of it was made immediately available and was used prior to the 1st of July, so that for the current fiscal year, from the 1st of July, 1909, to June 30, 1910, there will be only available $175,000, whereas we appropriate in this bill $215,155. But in addition to the appropriation carried in this bill there is available for this work from the general educational board $102,000. There was contributed last year $19,000 by local authorities, and I presume at least that much will be contributed this year, and there was about $1,000 available from the Slater fund. A part of the amount from the general educational board and the Slater fund was diverted to other purposes, aside from combating the boll weevil, but as I understand it the greater part of that sum was used in this contest.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman does not want to give the idea or impression that the $102,000 given by the general board of education is now used in the boll-weevil district?

Mr. SCOTT. My understanding of it is that a large part of it was so used.

Mr. LEVER. My understanding is entirely to the contrary. Every dollar of that is now used in the South Atlantic States, and not one penny of it is used in the boll-weevil district.

Mr. SCOTT. My authority was a portion of the statement of Doctor Galloway, but I may have misread it. But leaving out the amount of any fund that may be available from other sources, it is yet clear that there will be available this year something like $40,000 more for this work than there was last year.

Now, what has been done with this appropriation from year to year?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think the importance of this question will warrant me in asking an extension of time for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. The boll weevil first invaded Texas, coming from the Republic of Mexico. The climatic conditions in Texas were very different, of course, from those farther east. Methods were very soon developed in Texas which made it possible for the planters there to grow cotton quite successfully, in spite of the boll weevil, through the introduction of earlier maturing varieties and through the adoption of different methods of cultivation, so that the problem is about as nearly solved in Texas as it can be. But when the weevil advanced east and came into the warm, moist climate of the Delta country it presented an entirely different problem. It changed its habits of life to suit its environment. It was surrounded by greater opportunity for hibernation, so that an enormously greater number of weevils came through the winter than had survived the Texas winters. The result is that methods which have proved successful in Texas are practically of no value in the Delta country. As evidence of that I read from the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture a statement made by Mr. Hunter, who has been in charge of this work. He cited a single plantation near the mouth of the Red River, in Louisiana, that normally produced before the advent of the weevil from 1,700 to 2,000 bales of cotton. The first year after the advent of the weevil the production of that plantation went down to 1,200 bales. Last year it went down to 175 bales, and this year no cotton whatever was produced on the place. Now, I ask the attention of the committee particularly to what follows. The chairman asked Mr. Hunter whether they attempted to raise any cotton on that plantation this year, and he replied that they had made a very diligent and intelligent effort; that they planted 700 acres of cotton, and yet they did not harvest a single bale.

He then says of this planter that—

> He is one who takes pains to get all of the information available about fighting the boll weevil; he is a man of resources, a man who is not content with writing to experiment stations or the department for information, but when the time comes he gets on a train and goes to the experiment station or to some other source of information and remains there long enough to allow him to study the boll weevil.

He adds:

> No more intelligent fight could have been made against this insect than was made by this planter.

Mr. Chairman, let me repeat the statement, "no more intelligent fight could have been made against this insect than was made by this planter," and yet on 700 acres he did not produce a bale of cotton. What does that mean? It simply means that methods have not yet been discovered by which cotton can be grown under such conditions as exist there in the presence of the boll weevil. What does that mean? It means that the only effective work that can be done at the present time is to carry on experiments until we have developed better methods of control.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. To what extent has the boll weevil spread further, as a question of proportion? In other words, how many counties were affected in Mississippi last year?

Mr. SCOTT. I am not able to say.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. There were 13 counties, and now there are 36. The boll weevil entered the State eighteen months ago, and then crossed to Alabama, and there are 24 counties in Arkansas, and the south half of Oklahoma, and all of Louisiana. The gentleman is quite correct in his statement. These demonstrations must be made, but with the same amount of money we can not cover double the territory.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will pardon me, but the statement he makes now is not material to the argument. If it were merely a question of demonstration of methods which have been shown to give satisfactory control under these new conditions, then I would agree with him that we could spend more money to more advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[By unanimous consent Mr. SCOTT's time was extended for five minutes.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have just read a statement which shows that an intelligent white man, a successful, enterprising planter——

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Just 1 mile of water is between that man and myself. He is my neighbor.

Mr. SCOTT. This man has taken advantage of all the information available, and yet he was not able to raise a bale of cotton on 700 acres of land. It certainly leaves the conclusion inevitable that we have nothing to demonstrate. What is the use of appropriating a large sum of money, to be expended in demonstrations, when we have no methods that have proven satisfactory? That is the question, and upon that I think the Members of the House should base their judgment. It is not a question of demonstrating something which has already been learned, the success of which has been proven. It is simply a question of conducting research and experimentation that will result in developing a method which we may demonstrate hereafter.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the plantation referred to by the gentleman from Kansas is immediately across the river from my home. It is at the mouth of the Red River, in undrained lands. Very little of my district is of that character, and it has been demonstrated in that section where that land lays that you can not raise anything but perdition and alligators; cotton will not grow there.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the statement I have just made, to the effect that we can not economically expend this money along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DICKSON], because we have not yet developed anything to demonstrate, I wish to impress upon the committee the fact that the department has made no estimate for an increased appropriation for this purpose. The matter was called directly to the attention of Doctor Galloway when he was before the committee, and the question was asked whether he would recommend an increase in this farmers' cooperative demonstration work, and he replied:

> No; no increase along any of these lines. In fact, we are of the opinion that with our present funds and with the gradual effort we are making to adjust our work from time to time we are better off just as we are. That is, we believe that it is a good thing once in a while to stop and take stock, as it were, and develop things specifically, so that we will be in better condition to meet exigencies as they may arise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the Secretary and the chief of the bureau make no estimate for an increase, the fact that nobody came before the committee while we were considering this bill to ask for an increase, the fact, as clearly shown by the testimony, that methods have not yet been devised which will control the boll weevil under the new conditions and in the new territory, make it clear to my mind that the House will not be justified in increasing the appropriation beyond what is recommended by the committee, and I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will not be accepted.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can agree to vote on this amendment at 4 o'clock or in five or ten minutes? I do not wish to shut off debate unreasonably, but I should like to bring the matter to a conclusion not later than 4 o'clock, as gentlemen are anxious to have the committee rise.

Mr. CANDLER. There are several gentlemen who would be glad to be heard, not for a great length of time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close at 4 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close at 4 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did I understand the request of the gentleman from Kansas to be that debate on all amendments close at 4 o'clock?

Mr. SCOTT. On this paragraph.

Mr. HEFLIN. Suppose amendments had not yet been offered?

Mr. SCOTT. They could be offered and voted upon without further debate. I merely desire to close debate.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest, before agreeing to the request for unanimous consent, that there are several other amendments to be offered to this particular proposition and that I would not like to have debate closed until we can have time to debate those amendments.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman be satisfied to have the amendments offered? The same arguments that would apply to one amendment would perhaps apply to another.

Mr. LEVER. I think not, although I will not be contentious about the matter.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that I would like to have five minutes on this proposition, and I am afraid if we close at 4 o'clock I will not have that time. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas if he can not make it 5 minutes past 4, so as to allow me to have five minutes?

Mr. SCOTT. If that meets the approval of the committee, I will consent to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition now is to close debate at five minutes past 4 o'clock on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if that time is to be all taken up by one side of the question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, there is no controversy, no issue raised by the gentleman from Kansas, as to the dire condition of affairs in the cotton-growing section of this country. I thank him for his very frank acknowledgment of the necessitous condition of the case, and I thank him for his equally frank and enlightening statement that the Department of Agriculture and the country are, as to practical results, practical operation, and practical work in the field now affected, just where they began when the boll weevil first came into the United States and into the State of Texas, because when he says that after the problem had been solved in Texas, and the boll weevil migrated from there over into Louisiana and Mississippi, and now, according to the statement of my colleague, into the State of Alabama, an entirely new condition of things was presented and entirely new problems arose to be wrought out and solved. He says in effect that all that has been done is unavailing as to the new problems with which we are confronted, and that investigation and work must begin and be pushed just as if the question was entirely new and unexplored.

And that, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, together with the illustration that he cites, together with the case of the planter at the mouth of the Red River, who, after he had made a gallant fight against this pest, found himself overwhelmed by it, furnishes, to my mind and in my judgment, the greatest reason for the increase of this appropriation rather than the decrease of it. [Applause.]

I dissent from the proposition, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that because one brave man has failed, because one resourceful planter, not content to rely alone upon the activities of the Department of Agriculture, has been unable to meet this proposition, that we ought to lie down. I dissent from the proposition that this failure, made even after a splendid fight, demonstrates anything except that it is the duty of the people and of the Government of the United States to gird up their loins and go at the fight again with renewed vigor and energy.

Let me for a moment call attention to the radical differences that exist between the problem as it presented itself in Texas and the problem as it presents itself in the States farther east. In addition to the character of labor which has been alluded to by the gentlemen who preceded me, and which is of itself a great factor, there are conditions of soil and climate to which the gentleman from Kansas briefly alluded but which he did not elaborate. In the first place, the great part of the cotton crop of Texas, as I understand it, is grown upon the prairie; it is grown in the vast open country that is swept by the winds, and where there is no opportunity given to this insect, which seeks shelter and cover wherever it can, to hibernate, breed, and protect itself during the winter. Now, in Mississippi, and I take it that the conditions are similar in Louisiana and Alabama, our farming lands are interspersed with considerable patches of timber. There is abundant cover for the insect. We have a moist, humid, hot climate, all of which tends to increase the activities of the pest and to facilitate its opportunities for reproduction.

In the course of a trip through the western part of my district the latter part of last summer I met there a gentleman representing the Bureau of Entomology of the Department of Agriculture, who was making some investigations as to how far the boll weevil had progressed. Ignorant then of the difference between the problem that the Texas people were confronted with and that with which our people must contend I ventured to express the hope and belief that it would be a matter of no very great difficulty, because we could reach the question and meet it by improved cultural methods and by forcing and hastening the crop. To my amazement he advised me that the Texas crop is naturally far in advance in point of time than ours. All of the cotton that is not, to use the expression of the cotton planter, "made"—that is, all that is not in shape of bolls on the cotton plant—on the 1st of August must be destroyed by the boll weevil. Everything that comes along in the shape of squares, everything the plant attempts to make after that date, the weevil gets, and everyone conversant with cotton planting will know that it will be an exceedingly difficult thing to force the crop up to that date.

Bear in mind, gentlemen, that the territory affected by this pest has enormously increased in the last twelve months. It has moved eastward more rapidly than anyone supposed that it would or could, and inasmuch as the only method of combating it is by the education of the farmer by actual demonstration in the improved cultural methods and in handling the crop the amount of money necessary to meet the emergency is far greater than ever before.

The idea that the boll weevil can be destroyed by parasites or hostile insects has been practically abandoned, and the sole hope of the cotton planter is in obtaining earlier varieties and in forcing the plant so that the crop will be ripe and ready to harvest at the earliest possible moment, together with other precautions which the Department of Agriculture recommends, to keep the fields as nearly as possible free of the weevil by gathering and burning all the fallen squares and bolls that have been punctured or inoculated by it. This, as I have said, must be done by actual demonstration, and it needs no argument to show that with the increase in territory that must be covered by this work there comes necessarily, in order to do it properly, a corresponding increase in cost.

Let me give you some idea of the ravages that have been wrought within twelve months by the coming of this pest. I hold in my hand the report of December 31, 1909, of the Bureau of the Census as to cotton ginned up to December 13 of that year and prior years, but I will content myself by drawing comparisons between the results in 1909 and the preceding year, 1908.

Up to December 13, 1908, there had been ginned in Adams County 13,213 bales. Up to the same date in 1909 only 1,592 bales. In the county of Amite in 1908, 24,870 bales; in 1909, 13,612 bales; in the county of Claiborne, 20,540 bales in 1908, as against 8,893 in 1909; in the county of Jefferson, 19,082 bales in 1908, as against 7,944 in 1909; in the county of Wilkinson, 16,414 bales in 1908, as against 4,271 in 1909. I could multiply these examples without number, but they are sufficient to show the extreme necessity of the situation, and the discrepancy would be far more startling if I made comparisons between the figures of 1909 and those of 1906, before the boll weevil had at all affected this territory.

Just here I want to call attention to something that these figures show in refutation of one of the ideas advanced by the gentleman from Kansas, namely, that nothing can be done by demonstration work, and that only research work can be prosecuted for some little while to come. Cotton can be raised, boll weevil or no boll weevil, and the fact that cotton has been raised in these counties and in the parishes just across the river in the State of Louisiana, where the insect is at work, demonstrates that such is the case. That being true, and there can be no doubt of it, it follows that there is the greatest necessity that all this territory, and all the infected territory all through the South, should be liberally supplied with the experts of the department who understand the needs of the situation, in order that the farmers may be enabled to make the best of the situation and produce this crop, which is a necessity not only to them, but to the balance of the United States and to the world at large, as largely and bountifully as is possible under the conditions. The idea that the coming of the boll weevil means the passing of the cotton crop is a heresy that should be instantly met and combated. The disposition to abandon or give up, that such a preachment will produce, the consternation and panic which will be wrought by the promulgation of any such doctrine is, in my judgment, fraught with more danger to the agriculturists of the cotton section than the coming of the boll weevil itself. The boll weevil is bad enough, but I believe, and those more familiar with the subject believe, that it can be met, its ravages minimized, and finally entirely overcome by the methods which I have pointed out. It is a calamity which can be met, but panic, demoralization, abandonment of the fields, and all the inaction and loss incident thereto are far more serious in their consequences, and may or may not be entirely corrected if ever they once take firm hold.

Just one suggestion in conclusion. While the cotton planters are now the persons most immediately concerned, they are by no means the only people who are vitally interested in the result of this issue. Cotton is not only the great staple of the South, but one of the greatest agricultural staples in this country. Its annual value is second only to the corn crop. Its exportation, perhaps more than any other staple, goes to maintain the balance of trade in favor of the United States as against foreign nations. It constitutes in great part the clothing not only of the people of the South, but of the United States and of the world. Every mill and spindle in the East, every loom in Europe, every man in this Nation and in the world who wears clothes is vitally interested in the outcome of this struggle.

Let me appeal to you, not only in behalf of our people, but in behalf of the people of the United States, aye, of the world, not to deny the money necessary to save, and to save now, the production of this staple. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to see, now, if we can not reach an agreement as to the time for taking this vote. I will ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at fifteen minutes after 4 o'clock. The gentlemen will have no difficulty in having their remarks extended in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas, the chairman of the committee, that he ask unanimous consent that the vote on this pending amendment be taken at 4 o'clock, so that the debate on the amendments may be closed at that time and a vote taken, because it will be followed by another amendment carrying a smaller appropriation for this work.

Mr. SCOTT. I will act upon that suggestion, and ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken upon this amendment at 4 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas modifies his request and now asks unanimous consent that the vote be taken on this amendment at 4 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, it will be impossible to overstate the situation as it exists in some counties in Mississippi at the present time, where the boll weevil has attacked the cotton crop. But the ravages of the boll weevil is not confined to Mississippi alone, but is all through Louisiana and Texas, 24 counties in Arkansas, 36 in Mississippi, and the south half of Oklahoma are affected by the pest, and it has crossed the Alabama line. Hence it is this territory that is involved in this amendment, and unquestionably the extent of the territory requires the appropriation which is proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DICKSON], and he is himself a farmer and knows the needs of the people. As has been suggested by my colleague [Mr. BOWERS] who has just preceded me, the conditions that exist in our section of the country are entirely different from what they were when the boll weevil attacked the cotton crop in the State of Texas. We have conditions which make it an almost ideal place for the ravages of the boll weevil. The timber in which he can hibernate and the dampness of our atmosphere add to the danger which now threatens our crop and our prosperity. These surroundings are different from what they were in Texas, and hence it is necessary to have an appropriation sufficient in order to take hold of the condition that exists now, and not only now, but where it has existed prior to this time. It is not a problem that is strictly local, because the results affect the whole country. Heretofore wherever there has been a calamity, no matter where it has been, that has struck any of our people of the United States or any people in foreign countries, this great Government of ours has never plead economy or that we were unable to respond to it; but on all occasions and everywhere when anything of that nature happened we have responded not only for our own people, but to all the nations of the world. [Loud applause.] A few years ago when there was a great catastrophe in Italy we immediately responded by appropriating $800,000 for those people, and when a terrible earthquake visited San Francisco we at once responded with millions of dollars to help them.

Now, then, while this is not a case entirely parallel, I simply cite these, Mr. Chairman, to demonstrate that wherever the people have called for it, and have needed money, our Government has always with open hand responded to help them in their difficulties and in their misfortunes. Now, I say to you, this is in deed and in truth a misfortune to the people wherever this pest is. And it is not only in Mississippi, but these other States, where it is a misfortune and is beyond any abstract conception, and to fully appreciate and realize it in its fullness requires actual observation. I cite one case, which my colleague [Mr. DICKSON] calls to my attention. In one place in Louisiana, where they had raised 32,000 bales of cotton in 1906, in 1909 they only raised 2,500. Doctor Hunter, of Dallas, Tex., states:

> The insect has been worked on a great deal for several years, but its habits and life history are not yet clear. Climatic conditions of the different regions, the surroundings of the plantations, and plantation management cause the problem to take on local aspects.

That is the condition that I present to you, that it is a new problem when it reaches a section of country entirely different from what it was when it was treated in Texas.

Mr. SCOTT. The fact that it is a new problem impresses me, as I stated a moment ago, with the fact that what is needed now is experiment work and not demonstration work; and that we have abundant money here now to carry forth all the research that can be desired. Does it not impress the gentleman from Mississippi that way?

Mr. CANDLER. Well, I disagree with the gentleman. I think demonstration as well as experimental work is needed, and the amount of money appropriated in this bill is the very thing we are talking about; and we need more money. There is not a sufficient amount appropriated in this bill to do the work that is absolutely necessary and required.

Mr. SCOTT. You know there is money for investigation, but not for demonstration, and there is no necessity for demonstration until the investigation has been made.

Mr. CANDLER. We made an appropriation heretofore for this purpose, and did so without any hesitancy, when conditions that presented themselves to the House at that time were not as they are to-day, because the problem is a much more difficult one now. The distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. SCOTT] stated in his speech a moment ago that it is a different problem, and he says so now.

But he contends that there is sufficient money. As I said a moment ago, what I contend is that there is not sufficient money to do the work and that we need more money with which to meet this problem. This destructive agency which is threatening the prosperity of our entire country is continually spreading, and I appeal to you and plead with you not to turn your backs upon us, but to help us meet this difficulty, because the cotton crop of the South is the one that goes beyond the seas and brings back the money from the coffers of the nations of the world. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the committee, the time for debate on this amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi) there were—ayes 63, noes 57.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers, and pending that demand I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCOTT) there were—ayes 58, noes 62.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 58, the noes 62, and the committee refuses to rise.

Mr. SCOTT. I renew my demand for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SCOTT and Mr. DICKSON.

A MEMBER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Upon what question is this vote by tellers being taken?

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; on the question whether the committee will rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] said:

> I demand tellers, and pending that I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then the vote was taken on the question of the committee rising, by a rising vote, and then the Chair stated that the gentleman from Kansas demanded tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas demanded tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and pending that he made a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. TAWNEY. The question whether the committee shall rise is now being voted on by tellers, instead of a rising vote.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the Chair announced the result of the vote on the question whether the committee should rise, and there was no demand for tellers on that question, but tellers were demanded on the other motion, that of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think I can make a statement which will set gentlemen right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. I think I can clear this matter up very readily. It is true, as the gentleman from Texas just stated, that after the motion to rise was defeated upon a division, I then renewed the demand for tellers, having in my own mind the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DICKSON]. It is perfectly competent, of course, for any Member of the House to ask for tellers upon the motion that the committee rise, but I did not make that request.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman to make that request. If it is proper to make request for tellers on the motion that the committee rise, I make it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that that is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota now demands tellers on the question whether the committee shall rise. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered. The question is, Shall the committee rise?

Mr. BURLESON. Who are the tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DICKSON]. Those in favor of the committee rising will pass between the tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 88 ayes and 77 noes.

So the committee determined to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the agricultural appropriation bill and had instructed him to report that they had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of David Horner, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James Hanna, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

INTERNATIONAL SPORTING AND FIELDS SPORTS EXPOSITION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 605), which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, recommending that the sum of $50,000 be appropriated by the Congress to enable the United States to participate in the First International Sporting and Fields Sports Exposition, which will open at Vienna in May, 1910, to take part in which a cordial invitation to the United States was extended by the Government of Austria-Hungary.

For the purpose of such participation, my predecessor recommended an appropriation of $250,000, based on an estimate of exhibits which it would have been at that time possible to collect and prepare for the exposition. Inasmuch as the near approach of the time for the opening of the exposition does not now admit of an exhibit by the United States so elaborate and extensive as was at first contemplated, this amount is reduced by the Secretary of State to $50,000, and his recommendation that this sum be appropriated has my approval.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1910.

REPORT OF THE GEORGETOWN GAS LIGHT COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Georgetown Gas Light Company for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1909 (H. Doc. No. 623), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON, SPA SPRINGS AND GRETTA RAILROAD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Washington, Spa Springs and Gretta Railroad Company for the year ended December 31, 1909 (H. Doc. No. 616), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

VESSEL BRIG "KITTY."

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the findings of fact and conclusions of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims, set out in the annexed findings by the court, relating to the vessel brig Kitty, William Waters, master (H. Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the survey of the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska and the preparation of necessary maps and field notes thereof, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, submitted a report (No. 131) thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] on the 27th instant, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Senate resolution 156.

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee during the Sixty-first Congress, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendments were, in line 6, before the word "use," to strike out the word "the" and insert "its;" and, after the word "use," to strike out the words "of the committee."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

LORINDA A. HOOKS.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. BULKELEY on the 28th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 160.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Lorinda A. Hooks, widow of Charles E. Hooks, late a messenger, United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary, at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15384) making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, I report back the bill favorably with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 132) thereon.

I wish to give notice that I shall call up the bill following the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which will soon be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to put in the RECORD the following figures:

The army appropriation bill as it passed the Senate last year carried $102,636,050.34.

As it finally became a law it stood at $101,197,470.34.

The present bill as it came from the House carried	$95,297,707.55
The net increase recommended by the Senate committee amounts to	142,860.00
So the total of the bill as reported to the Senate stands at	95,440,567.55

And the lines or amounts of the House and the Senate are near enough together so that if the bill should pass the Senate as reported it would not exceed $96,000,000 nor fall short of $95,000,000, which is something like $6,000,000 less than the bill carried last year.

The fortifications appropriations bill, which passed the Senate last week, it will be remembered, carried nearly $2,000,000 less than the corresponding bill of last year. So the desire to cut expenses this year has been observed so far by provisions for the military establishment, and it is the expectation, and certainly the hope, that other appropriation bills to follow may as closely observe this desire, which has been so generally expressed, to cut down the expenses of the Government.

IMMIGRANTS IN CITIES.

Mr. DILLINGHAM submitted the following, which was read and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Immigration:

THE IMMIGRATION COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1910.

To the Sixty-first Congress:

I have the honor to transmit herewith, on behalf of the Immigration Commission, a report on immigrants in cities.

This report, which has been prepared by Mr. E. A. Goldenweiser, under the direction of the commission, is the result of a detailed inquiry into living conditions among more than 10,000 households in the most congested districts of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland, Buffalo, and Milwaukee.

W. P. DILLINGHAM, Chairman.

A bill (S. 5998) to authorize Aransas Pass Channel and Dock Company to construct a bridge across Morris and Cumming channel; to the Committee on Commerce.

(By request.) A bill (S. 5999) for the relief of the estate of Oliver P. Boyd, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 6000) to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs Reservation in Arkansas;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(By request.) A bill (S. 6001) providing for the creation of a reserve oil fuel supply for the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WARREN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 74) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy Mr. Juan Torroella y Rooney, of Cuba; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXAMINATIONS OF PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. HEYBURN. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) relative to the appointment of a board of three geologists to examine, classify, and report upon the mineral resources of the Canal Zone was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 72.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a board of three geologists of learning and experience, who shall be located along and about the Panama Canal and its environments, who shall thoroughly examine, classify, and report upon the geology of the Canal Zone.

That the members of said board shall act jointly or separately, as the convenience and efficiency of the work shall require, and that their reports may be joint or separate.

That the members of said board shall make and complete, so far as it is possible, an examination of the geology exposed in connection with the work of excavating the canal before such work is covered with water or inclosed within retaining walls or other structure, to the end that the examination may be made while the exposed conditions are subject to inspection.

That the members of said board shall each receive a salary of $4,000 per annum and their necessary traveling and subsistence expenses.

Mr. HEYBURN. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) providing for the appointment of two persons to examine, classify, and report upon the flora, fauna, and other natural features within the Panama Canal Zone was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 73.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint two persons who shall be learned and experienced botanists, arborists, and naturalists, to be employed within and about the Canal Zone, who shall make a thorough examination and classification of the flora, fauna, and other natural features within said zone, and who shall make a report of their work to the President.

Said persons shall each receive a salary of $4,000 per annum and their necessary traveling and subsistence expenses.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment authorizing the appointment of a board of three geologists to examine, classify, and report upon the geology of the Canal Zone, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relative to an examination and classification of the flora and fauna and other natural features of the Canal Zone, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment proposing to pay from the reclamation fund for the benefit of the Uinta Indians the sum of $1.25 per acre for the lands in the former Uinta Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ADELIA S. HOFF.

Mr. MONEY. I ask leave to introduce a resolution affecting a bill which was referred by the Committee on Claims to the Court of Claims. It is to correct the record in that bill, and it is done with the consent of and after conference with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who is the author of the bill. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 161) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 161.

Whereas on the 25th of February, 1909, a bill (S. 9482, 60th Cong., 2d sess.) was introduced in the Senate of the United States for the relief of the heirs at law of John W. Norwood, deceased, late of Fannin County, in the State of Texas, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to A. N. Norwood and Mrs. M. E. Palmer, as heirs at law of said John W. Norwood, deceased, the sum of $68,875 in full compensation for stores, supplies, and property taken during the late civil war for the use of and used by the federal forces in said civil war; and

Whereas the said bill was referred to the Court of Claims of the United States, under Senate resolution No. 320, Sixtieth Congress, second session, March 3, 1909, the said Court of Claims being authorized to act under said reference, and has been duly docketed congressional and numbered 14189; and

Whereas it had been disclosed that Mrs. Adelia S. Hoff, of Mississippi, is an heir at law of said John W. Norwood, deceased, and a coheir with said A. N. Norwood and said Mrs. M. E. Palmer, and entitled to any benefits arising from the hearing of said claim in the said Court of Claims, and the three heirs at law mentioned are the sole heirs at law of said John W. Norwood, deceased: Therefore be it Resolved, That in the conduct and trial of said claim under and by virtue of said bill and reference to said Court of Claims March 3, 1909, by the Senate of the United States, the interest of said Adelia S. Hoff be considered by said court, and that she be included as one of the heirs at law of said John W. Norwood, deceased, in said court.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 970. An act for the relief of Edward C. Kittle; and

H. R. 2828. An act for the relief of William Martinson.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 18681. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 19278. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 19403. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5236) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and to certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The amendments were, on page 15, to strike out line 1, down to and including line 4; and on page 25 to strike out line 10, down to and including line 14.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

PAROLE OF PRISONERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. BACON. Before proceeding to the calendar, I have a request to make of the Senate.

There was introduced by me at the present session a bill (S. 870) to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes, which is now on the calendar, under Rule IX. The bill went to the Committee on the Judiciary and came back with a unanimous report favorable to it. The same bill had passed the Senate during the former Congress.

This bill went to the calendar under Rule VIII. During my necessary absence, while I was personally ill, at the instance of some one, the bill was transferred to the calendar under Rule IX. I am sure it will be recognized as not usual in the absence of the Senator who has introduced a bill to have that action taken. I do not know by whom it was done; I presume by some one who did not know that I was providentially absent.

I ask that the bill may be restored to its place on the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 870) to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes, be restored to its place on the calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have no objection, of course, to the present consideration of this bill in order that the Senator from Montana may address the Senate on it; but I want it understood that, by taking it up now for present consideration, it is not to be made the regular order of business. I think probably it would not be, even under the request, but I want no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. CARTER. At the close of the morning hour the unfinished business will, as usual, be laid before the Senate, I understand, and a member of the committee having that measure in charge will then ask that it be temporarily laid aside. I stated to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], the chairman of the Committee on Territories, that it was not my disposition to displace the unfinished business by a motion if the consideration of this measure could proceed from day to day without interference by the unfinished business.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand the rule, the request which the Senator from Montana now prefers would not extend in its effect beyond this day.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that to be true.

Mr. BAILEY. With that understanding I have certainly no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No objection is heard to the request of the Senator from Montana, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point in the proceedings, to the end that those disposed to inquire into its terms may find it in a convenient place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will, I presume, wish to have the amendments that the committee has reported printed in the RECORD, bracketed or in some such way, that we may see what they are.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I include that in my request.

There being no objection, the bill, as reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, established a system of postal savings depositories under the supervision and direction of a board of trustees, which board shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, acting ex officio. All regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed by said board of trustees, and any general regulation prescribed by the Postmaster-General under authority of this act shall be subject to the approval of said board. Said board shall report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session their transactions under the provisions of this act, including a statement showing the number of post-offices receiving deposits of postal savings in each State and Territory, the aggregate amount of deposits made therein, the aggregate of withdrawals therefrom, the amount of interest paid to depositors, and the amount of extra expense incident to the system of postal savings, and all other facts and recommendations which they may deem pertinent and proper to present.

SEC. 2. That [each and] every post-office within the United States which is authorized to issue money orders, and such others as the Postmaster-General in his discretion may from time to time designate, are hereby declared to be postal savings depository offices to receive deposits from the public and to account for and dispose of the same according to this act. Every postal savings depository office shall be kept open for the transaction of business every day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) during the usual post-office business hours of the town or locality where such depository is located, and between such additional specific hours as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, if he deems it necessary or more practical, establish at first postal savings depositories only at the money-order offices of the first, second, and third classes, and thereafter extend the system as rapidly as practicable to all other post-offices specified above.

SEC. 3. That accounts may be opened and deposits made in any postal savings depository established under this act by any person of the age of 10 years or over, in his or her own name, and by a married woman in her own name and free from any control or interference by her husband; but no person shall simultaneously have more than one postal savings account.

SEC. 4. That the postmaster at a postal savings depository shall, upon the making of an application to open an account under this act and the submission of an initial deposit, deliver to the depositor a pass book upon which shall be written the name and signature or mark of the depositor and such other memoranda as may be necessary for purposes of identification, in which pass book entries of all deposits shall be made: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, with the approval of the board of trustees, adopt some other device in lieu of a pass book as a means of making and preserving evidence of deposits.

SEC. 5. That at least $1, or a larger amount in multiples thereof, must be deposited before an account is opened with the person depositing the same, and $1, or multiples thereof, may be deposited after such account has been opened, but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month: Provided, That in order that smaller amounts may be accumulated for deposit any person may purchase from any depository office for 10 cents a postal savings card to which may be attached specially prepared adhesive stamps, to be known as "postal savings stamps," and when the stamps so attached amount to $1, or a larger sum in multiples thereof, including the 10-cent postal savings card, the same may be presented as a deposit for opening an account, and additions may be made to any account by means of such card and stamps in amounts of $1, or multiples thereof, and when a card and stamps thereto attached are redeemed by any postmaster he shall immediately cancel the same. It is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster-General to prepare such postal savings cards and postal savings stamps of denominations of 10 cents, and to keep them on sale at every postal savings depository office, and to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the issue, sale, and cancellation thereof.

SEC. 6. That interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum shall be allowed and entered to the credit of each depositor once in each year, the same to be computed on such basis and under such rules and regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe; but interest shall not be computed or allowed on any amount less than $1, or some multiple thereof: Provided, That the balance to the credit of any one person shall never be allowed to exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest.

SEC. 7. That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe. No bank in which postal savings funds shall be deposited shall receive any exchange or other fees or compensation on account of the cashing or collection of any checks or the performance of any other service in connection with the postal savings depository system.

SEC. 8. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum. Where more than one such bank is available the deposits shall be distributed ratably among the banks as far as practicable on the basis of their capital and surplus. The board of trustees shall take from such bank or banks such indemnity bonds as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt repayment of such deposits on demand. At its option any bank may deposit collateral security in lieu of an indemnity bond, such collateral to be subject to the approval of said board. If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, or in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits were received: Provided, That postal savings funds deposited in any State or Territory in which no provision is made by law governing the investment of savings bank funds may be invested in the same character of securities in such State or Territory as are made the subject of investment of savings bank funds by the laws of the States of New York or California: Provided further, That said board of trustees shall maintain a reserve fund, either with the Treasurer of the United States or the banks as herein provided, not more in amount than 10 per cent of the total funds deposited in postal savings depositories. Interest and profits accruing from the deposit or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of expenses of administration authorized by the board of trustees and approved by the Postmaster-General and of interest due to postal savings depositors as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury as part of the postal revenues: Provided, That in the Treasury or with the Treasurer of the United States postal savings funds shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act and not otherwise. For the [purpose] purposes of this act the word "Territory," as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

SEC. 9. That postal savings depository funds shall be kept separate from other funds by postmasters and other officers and employees of the postal service, who shall be held to the same accountability under their bonds for such funds as for public moneys; and no person connected with the Post-Office Department shall disclose to any person other than the depositor the amount of [his or her] any deposit, unless directed so to do by the Postmaster-General. All statutes relating to the safe-keeping of and proper accounting for public moneys are made applicable to such funds, and the Postmaster-General may require postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at postal savings depositories to give any additional bond he may deem necessary.

SEC. 10. That additional compensation shall be allowed postmasters at post-offices of the fourth class for the transaction of postal savings depository business. Such compensation shall be at not to exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent on the average sum upon which interest is paid each calendar year on receipts at such post-office, and shall be paid from the postal revenues; but postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at post-offices of the presidential grade shall not receive any additional compensation for such service.

SEC. 11. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Postmaster-General and the board of trustees to establish a system of postal savings depositories in accordance with the provisions of this act; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to require postmasters and other postal officers and employees to transact, in connection with their other duties, such postal savings depository business as may be necessary; and he is also authorized to make, and with the approval of the board of trustees to promulgate, and from time to time modify or revoke, such rules and regulations not in conflict with law as he may deem necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 12. That postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be entitled to all the safeguards provided by law for the protection of public moneys, and all statutes relating to the embezzlement, conversion, [and] improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of postal and money-order funds and the punishments provided for such offenses are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings depository funds, and all statutes relating to false returns of postal and money-order business, the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, [and other] improper use or handling of postal and money-order blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor, with the penalties provided in such statutes, are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings depository business, and the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, [and other] improper use or handling of postal savings depository blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect on the first day of the third calendar month after its approval.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the question involved in the pending bill has been under consideration for over one hundred years. It has challenged the attention of philanthropists, financiers, economists, and statesmen throughout the civilized world. It was first put to the test of practical experience in Great Britain in 1861, and thereafter in other countries in the order in which I name them: Canada, Belgium, Japan, Italy, Netherlands, France, Austria, Sweden, Hungary, Finland, Russia, and the colonies and dependencies of such of them as have outside possessions.

Those familiar with the political geography of the earth will readily perceive that the system has been operated in both densely populated and sparsely settled regions, and I aver, on the basis of the record to which I propose to refer the Senate, that it is operated in countries of limited extent and those of broad territorial expanse with equal facility, success, and satisfaction.

In the German Empire the system has not been adopted, for the adequate reason that the municipal savings banks of that country furnish to the people substantially the same widespread and secure accommodations for saving small sums the postal system has supplied elsewhere. The United States enjoys the unique, although not flattering, distinction of being the only first-class power on the globe to deny to the people the privileges and the blessings enjoyed under this system by the citizens and subjects of nearly every other nation in the civilized world, outside of Latin America, and the Republic of Chile is now installing such banks.

The subject was first brought forward officially in this country by Postmaster-General Creswell in 1871. That officer evidently felt that he was then responding to a public demand, and such was the approval manifested by the press and the people that he reiterated his recommendations in 1872 and 1873. Postmaster-General Maynard took up the subject in his report for 1880; Postmaster-General James in 1881; Postmaster-General Howe in 1882; Postmaster-General Wanamaker in 1889 and in 1890; Postmaster-General Gary in 1897 and in 1898; Postmaster-General Meyer in 1907 and 1908, and thereafter until the close of his official connection with the Post-Office Department. Postmaster-General Hitchcock, in his annual report recently presented to Congress, again announces the adherence of his great department to the cause of postal savings banks.

Preparatory to the last presidential campaign the Republican party, the Democratic party, the Prohibition party, and the Independence League each declared for postal savings banks. The conventions of the parties named were not only commissioned to nominate candidates for the offices of President and of Vice-President, but they were expected, in conformity with established usage, to give expression to the views of the electors they severally represented on issues involving the public welfare and the policy of the National Government. In the campaign which followed the subject of postal savings banks was advocated by the candidates and mentioned with approval by public speakers representing all the contending political forces. If dissent was anywhere voiced, it was lost in the overwhelming volume of commendation.

The Republican platform said:

> We favor the establishment of a postal savings-bank system, for the convenience of the people and the encouragement of thrift.

The Democratic platform reads:

> We favor a postal savings bank if the guaranteed bank can not be secured, and that it be constituted so as to keep the deposited money in the communities where it is established.

The Independence League declared:

> The Independence League advocates the establishment of the parcels post and government postal savings banks, where the people's deposits will be secure.

In his message to Congress in December, following the election of 1908, President Roosevelt again renewed his earnest recommendations for postal savings-bank legislation. President Taft has kept the faith announced during the campaign by repeatedly advocating postal savings banks in addressing Congress, in public speeches, and in private conversations.

Early in the second session of the Sixtieth Congress the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate favorably reported a bill providing a system of postal savings depositories. That bill was made the unfinished business, and discussion proceeded upon it until nearly the close of the session. The disputed points related chiefly to the provisions of the bill covering administrative details. No Senator was heard to question the feasibility or the desirability of the system proposed. The committee has eliminated from the pending bill the numerous provisions relating to administrative matters and has vested in a board of trustees, to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, all regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited, subject, of course, to the condition that such regulations shall be in harmony with the provisions of the bill. It is confidently believed that the board of trustees can wisely and effectively regulate the details of the business in the light of the experience of other countries and such experience as they will acquire from year to year. With administrative details thus provided for, the Senate is called upon to consider only the principle and the question of public policy involved.

This leads us at once to a consideration of the provisions and the merits of the bill.

Section 1 establishes the system under the direction of a board of trustees, to be composed, as before stated, of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General acting ex officio. These officers are empowered to make necessary rules and regulations for the administration of the law and are required to report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session their transactions under the provisions of the act, including a statement showing the number of post-offices receiving deposits of postal savings in each State and Territory, the aggregate amount of deposits made therein, the aggregate of withdrawals therefrom, the amount of interest paid to depositors, and all other facts and recommendations which they may deem pertinent and proper to present.

Section 2 declares that every post-office within the United States which is authorized to issue money orders, and such others as the Postmaster-General, in his discretion, may from time to time designate, are declared to be postal savings-depository offices, to be kept open for the transaction of postal savings business during the post-office hours; and it is further provided that the Postmaster-General may, if he deems it necessary or more practical, establish at first post-office savings depositories only at the money-order offices of the first, second, and third classes, and thereafter extend them as rapidly as practical to the other offices specified.

Section 3 provides that accounts may be opened and deposits made by any person of the age of 10 years or over in his or her own name, and by a married woman, free from any control or interference by her husband, but no person shall simultaneously have more than one postal savings account.

Section 4 provides that any person described in the preceding section may open an account at any post-office depository on the submission of an initial deposit to the postmaster, who shall deliver to such depositor a pass book or other device for making and preserving evidence of deposits.

Section 5 provides that at least $1 or multiples thereof must be deposited before an account is opened, and $1 or multiples thereof may be added to the account, but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month. By the same section it is provided that smaller amounts may be accumulated. Any person may purchase from any depository office for 10 cents a postal savings card, to which may be attached specially prepared adhesive stamps, to be known as "postal savings stamps," and when the stamps and the card amount to $1, or a larger sum in multiples thereof, the same may be deposited to the credit of the account, whereupon the card and stamps are to be canceled by the postmaster.

Section 6 provides that interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum shall be allowed and entered to the credit of each depositor once in each year, and limits the balance to the credit of any one person to a sum not exceeding $500, exclusive of accumulated interest.

Section 7 provides that the depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with accrued interest, upon compliance with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe.

Section 8 provides that savings funds received under the act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision or examination in the State or Territory, and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum. Where more than one such bank is available the deposits shall be distributed ratably, as far as practicable, on the basis of their capital and surplus. The banks will be required to give such indemnity bonds as the trustees may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt repayment of the deposits on demand. At its option a bank may deposit approved collateral security in lieu of an indemnity bond. If banks refuse to receive the deposits on the terms prescribed, the funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of the board, and may be invested in bonds or other securities of the United States, or in such bonds or securities as are approved for investment of savings deposits by the laws of the respective States in which the deposits are received.

The act is made applicable to the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply wish to ask whether the Senator from Montana will be disturbed by an inquiry? I do not want to ask a question if it would disturb the continuity of his address, but I do want, at the proper time, to make some inquiries concerning certain parts of this bill; I will say, not in any hostile spirit, for I am thoroughly in favor of the bill, that I think there ought to be some minor changes in it. I shall not make those inquiries now if the Senator would prefer that I should delay them until another time.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, as I am dealing largely with explanatory matter with reference to the bill, I believe it would be better to present a continuous statement, and that inquiries should be deferred until after the conclusion of my regular statement of the case, if convenient to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will, then, defer the questions until another time.

Mr. CARTER. It is made the duty of officers and employees of the postal service to transact postal savings-depository business without extra charge, but additional compensation, not exceeding one-fourth of 1 per cent, is allowed to postmasters in offices of the fourth class.

Aside from making certain penal statutes applicable to place the necessary safeguards about the funds, the bill is, in substance, as I have stated.

The system will ultimately be applied to 51,000 post-offices. These figures I state in round numbers for convenience. My memory is that there are 51,000 and some odd post-offices issuing money orders. The number of post-offices in the country has been decreasing, owing to the extension of rural free delivery and the consolidation of post-offices incident to the extension of that service. I repeat, the system will ultimately be applied to 51,000 post-offices, that being the approximate number of money-order offices at the present time; but by virtue of a proviso it may be applied in the beginning to offices of the presidential grade, to wit, first, second, and third class offices, of which there are about 7,500. From this beginning the system will be gradually extended until it embraces the 51,000 offices to which it is made applicable.

Upon the threshold of the discussion we will encounter an objection which has been urged in one form or another against every movement to increase the usefulness of the postal service. Under authority of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, which gives to Congress power to establish post-offices and post-roads, our postal system was founded. In the beginning it was confined to carrying letters and papers for postage, and the distribution of government documents, information, and orders over a limited area. In response to a public demand, its scope was extended gradually so as to include periodicals, books, and even merchandise. In 1855 the registry service was established under authority of an act of Congress, and in 1864 the Post-Office Department was authorized to install a system for the transmission of small sums of money through the mails, and this departure marked the beginning of our present stupendous money-order service. This service went into operation on the 1st day of October, 1864, and has continued not only unimpaired, but liberally extended beyond the limitations prescribed in the original act.

Since then we have attached to the registry system a guaranty feature, which obligates the Government to pay a restricted sum as damages for loss incurred through the loss of a registered package. Let no one suppose that the registering of packages containing money, merchandise, and valuable papers was not regarded in 1855 as an unwarranted use of power, nor need we doubt that the intrusion of the post-office machinery into the exchange business of the country did not meet with opposition in 1864. Yet a trial has demonstrated the wonderful convenience and the practical utility of both the registry and the money-order departures. Our predecessors in these legislative halls found a postal system established under constitutional authority with ample facilities to reach every part of the country, and they wisely and properly placed upon the installed machinery certain additional burdens for the benefit of the people for whom Congress legislates. To-day, as in 1855 and in 1864, we have the post-office system in full operation, with its business being transacted in some 59,000 post-offices, of which only 51,000 are money-order offices, and carried on over a network of post-roads of continental proportions. Every known means of transportation, from the malamute dog of Alaska to the space-annihilating express train on the trunk-line road, has been subjected to the service of this great system. The postal service comes into closer touch with neighborhood life everywhere than does any other arm of the Federal Government. It has followed the pioneer across the continent, and it goes laden with messages to the whaling fleet in the icebound harbors of Bering Sea. It connects the center with the circumference of our business world, and touches all intermediate points. This great system has done more than any other agency to make our people thoroughly homogeneous and generally well informed. It has earned and enjoys the confidence of all the people. In the midst of commotion men stand aside for the passage of the United States mail, and no one has ever deliberately assailed the postal service. Following lines of the utmost simplicity, it carries messages to and from the remotest parts of the country; it insures the careful transportation and safeguarding of small, valuable packages; it transfers money from one hand to another, across mountains, valleys, rivers, and lakes, and it is capable of adding yet a more beneficent service with no appreciable increase of force or cost. It is a governmental establishment, controlled and conducted by the Government for the use, convenience, and benefit of the people; and the bill now before us merely proposes to extend to the masses the privilege of using this vast governmental machine to facilitate the accumulation of small sums, through the employment of a system in no sense inconsistent with the general operations of the postal service. Indeed, the bill but elaborates a use to which the postal service is now subjected, for, as the report of the committee will show, a very large sum of money in all the States and Territories is invested in money orders payable to the purchaser and renewed annually at an expense of $3 per $1,000, as a penalty on thrift.

In my opinion, and I believe it correct, this additional service laid upon the department, far from being a burden on the postal revenues, will yield a small profit on the business transacted. If anyone will take the pains to analyze the provisions of the bill in the light of world-wide experience with postal savings banks I believe that the conclusion will inevitably be reached that the postal savings business will surely be self-sustaining and will probably yield a moderate profit.

The prime purpose of the measure is to encourage thrift among the masses of the people by furnishing widely distributed, convenient, and absolutely safe depositories wherein small sums may be placed at a low rate of interest, with the faith and credit of the Government pledged to the repayment of principal and interest on demand. All thoughtful men agree that the best interests of government and society are promoted by encouraging habits of industry, frugality, and thrift. The thrifty man is rarely a bad citizen, and good citizenship is the embodiment of respect for law and order. That which tends to promote thrift and to discourage reckless extravagance must inevitably tend to suppress vice and encourage virtue. The man whose earnings are being husbanded and cared for by the Government will be more loyal and devoted to the institutions of his country. The man who spends all he makes and never attempts to save is a raw recruit headed either for the jail, the poorhouse, or the charity of friends. But I need not dwell upon this at length. In the large centers where the savings banks are found the most casual observer will readily bear witness to the moral as well as the financial elevation to which they give rise. Compare, if you please, the standard of the average man of one hundred and fifty years ago, not only politically but morally, intellectually, financially, with the average man of to-day, and you must concede that the standard has been raised from every point of view. Many forces have combined to elevate men to a higher state of independence and self-respect, and among these forces, I believe, the savings bank has been one of the most potential. It is only about one hundred and thirty years since certain philanthropists commenced an agitation in Europe for the establishment of institutions to induce laboring people and the poor generally to save their earnings.

The first savings bank was established at Hamburg in 1788. The first institution of that kind was founded in this country in the city of Philadelphia in 1816. They were philanthropic institutions, organized in the main by retired merchants, professional men, and others disposed to reflect upon means and measures for the improvement of their fellow-men. The banks were established without capital, the originators merely contributing a pittance to pay for the preparation of blanks; the directors served without compensation, and the needed clerical force only received wages. Under this system, which is now commonly known as the "old-style" savings bank, the depositor received all of the net increment, the rate of interest assuming the form of a dividend, in which each person shared according to the amount of his deposit. Nearly, if not quite all of the savings banks of New England are of the old style, still, as formerly, conducted on philanthropic principles. The world has never given the full mead of praise due the noble men who originated and have since cherished and guarded these philanthropic institutions. In the course of time the old-style banks were supplemented by incorporated companies, these paying stipulated rates of interest and looking for profit to the margin between the interest paid and the interest received by the institution. This latter class of banks has been in the main well conducted, but they have fallen far short of the old-style institutions in beneficial service to the communities in which they have operated.

The old-style banks did business on such prudent and conservative lines that the name "savings bank" became synonymous with stability and safety. Having no speculative purpose, moved only by a desire to serve the interests of the struggling men, women, and children depositing with them, they, as a rule, eschewed speculation and avoided hazardous ventures, and with almost unvarying regularity met their engagements. They deserved and enjoyed unlimited confidence.

The advent of the incorporated company, bent upon making profits on its capital stock, imported into the field many of the elements of risk attending commercial ventures; and while failures have not been numerous, they have been far more distressing and deplorable than could be the case with the failure of a commercial bank of similar resources. As a rule the class of people who deposit in savings banks do not, in their absence, deposit in any bank at all; and, therefore, the slightest impairment of confidence in the savings bank quickly raises the question, "What is the use of trying to save anything?"

Very few savings banks have failed; indeed, their record is highly creditable; but it is well known that very small failures in this line have produced, and will produce, an impairment of confidence out of all proportion to the cause which gave rise to it. These conclusions are not novel, nor are they new. Considerations of the character to which I refer long ago led the lawmakers of New England and a few other States of the Union to provide the most rigid safeguards for the protection of savings-bank funds, but all the States have not provided such safeguards, and some of them have provided none at all.

Again, it must be borne in mind that a savings bank of any kind can only be established and maintained successfully in the midst of a population sufficiently dense and extensive to insure a volume of deposits adequate to form resources out of which expenses and interest can be made.

I concede at once that the New England States and the State of New York are well supplied with savings-bank accommodations, and such is the confidence inspired by good management and rigid laws in those States that the number of persons who either hoard or squander their earnings through fear of loss in banks is inconsiderable. The same may be conceded in a qualified sense as to the cities in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, California, and a few other States, but not as to the country districts in this last-mentioned group. In some States there are whole congressional districts without a savings institution of any kind, and, as a matter of fact, millions of people live in regions where the population is not sufficiently dense and numerous to sustain such institutions.

It will not answer to reply that commercial banks meet the requirements of the situation. This is not true; even if they were sufficiently numerous—which they are not—the postal depository is intended for the accommodation of people of small means, such as school children and the working classes, who do not patronize commercial banks, and to reach the whole population in rural districts where there are no banks.

If anyone doubts that there are such districts, he need but consult the information collected by the Monetary Commission created by the last Congress. That body reports some 22,000 banks of all kinds in the country, or an average of 1 bank to every 4,000 of population. If these banks were distributed geographically it might, with some show of reason, be claimed that every part of the country was supplied with some banking accommodation, but inspection of the report will show what the most unsophisticated person would at once suspect, that banks are located only at advantageous points, thus giving to the people residing at the centers advantages not enjoyed elsewhere. But, as I have before stated and here reassert, even if the commercial and other banks were widely distributed over the country they would not be patronized to any considerable extent by the class of people to whom the postal savings depository will furnish the needful elements of convenience and absolute confidence.

The small boy or girl and the timid adult with only a few dimes or a few dollars to be taken care of will not approach the counter of the well-furnished and opulent bank with that feeling of ease and self-assurance the same individual will display in going to the post-office to deposit the dime or the dollar. The post-office is the common meeting ground of all the men, women, and children of the community. They all enjoy a certain sense of proprietorship there. It is their post-office and the man in charge is their postmaster. In the course of its transactions the purchaser of a 2-cent stamp is treated with the same consideration as the purchaser of a hundred-dollar money order. In the very nature of things the bank has an air of exclusiveness. It savors of wealth and power and dominion.

When we take into account the very large aggregate deposits of the postal savings banks of other countries and then take note of the fact that between 40 and 50 per cent of their depositors are children and students, and between 14 and 15 per cent artisans and laborers, and about 8 per cent domestic servants, we are led at once to realize that this system is destined to bring into our midst, educate, and improve an army of depositors now wholly unknown in banking circles, and from the standpoint of the commercial bank undesirable patrons.

I say "educate," and I mean by that a most useful form of education, for who will contend that the habits of saving, banking, and being economical and prudent will not prove of inestimable value to the rising generation? But in addition to all this, be it remembered that, through the confidence inspired by the Government, the postal savings banks will bring into circulation millions upon millions of money now dormant and in hiding.

One of the most enlightened merchants of our generation, who has given to this subject very careful attention, entertains and expresses the opinion that one billion of our three billions of coin and currency is constantly in hiding. Even if this estimate is but half correct, it is quite obvious that such a source of weakness in our banking and commercial power should be strengthened. The cause of it should be removed if that can be done by a legislative enactment in no wise injurious in other respects.

But admitting that the postal savings system would encourage thrift and that the encouragement of thrift would prove beneficial and that money in hiding would be drawn into circulation, that accommodations would be furnished to people in remote parts of the country who are in sore need of such accommodations, the whole proposal is objectionable to some for a variety of reasons:

First. That it is unconstitutional for the Government to employ its own officers, its own equipment, its own facilities, for the accommodation of its own people along lines in harmonious accord with the general business of the Post-Office Department. To meet this view, it seems sufficient to say that the microscope has not yet been made which can disclose a difference in principle between the money-order system, which has been in progress since 1864, through which millions upon millions of dollars are handled each year for the accommodation of the people, and the system here proposed, through which other millions will be handled for them with equal ease and safety.

Second. It will be contended that the scheme is paternalistic. In reply to that I say that the whole business of the Post-Office Department may be considered paternalistic. It is an enormous establishment, conducted to enable the people to correspond with each other, to diffuse knowledge, and to transmit money and valuables from place to place. With equal justice we might condemn the practice of stocking the streams of the country with fish, testing the quality of soils, measuring the current of streams, the examining of plant and tree life, the inspection of cattle, and the thousand other activities into which the General Government has entered for the good of the people and the credit of the Government itself.

Then, it will be alleged that a thing which can be done through private enterprise should not be undertaken by the Government. That position is overwhelmed by the facts. The banks of this country have never furnished and never will be able to furnish to all the people as convenient stations for the receipt of savings as the Government can supply through the 51,000 money-order post-offices of the United States. These post-offices are now installed and business is being conducted in them, and will continue to be conducted, whether this additional duty is laid upon the service or not.

And, finally, we are confronted by the statement that the Government should keep out of the banking business. To this I assent, but at the same time and with equal emphasis I assert that the postal depository contemplated by this bill will in no comprehensive sense create or maintain a banking business. Only by the most distorted construction can the bill be charged with creating opposition to savings or commercial banks. True, the depositories will receive deposits, and these deposits will be paid back to the people on demand, and in the meantime the Government will guard and protect the money as the bill provides. But checks will not be cashed, paper will not be discounted, bills of exchange will not be sold, and none of the necessary facilities of a banking institution will be placed at the disposal of the public under this bill save and except that small sums will be received, limited in monthly aggregate and in total amount, the whole design being to reach out an encouraging hand to the children, the toiling masses, and people everywhere who do not or have not the opportunity to deposit savings through any other agency.

Instead of being a menace to the banks, this depository system will prove a source of strength to the financial structure. Such has been the experience everywhere else, and there is no reason to believe that the United States will prove an exception.

According to the United States Treasury Circular No. 72, issued in 1904, more than one-half of the gold coins struck at the mints of the United States have disappeared from circulation. No doubt some of the coins have been used in the arts, some have been lost beyond recovery in river, sea, or earth, but unquestionably the indestructible character of the coin and its unchanging value has marked it as a specially desirable object for hiding and hoarding. To a lesser degree all forms of our money are similarly withdrawn from circulation and sequestered, subject to constant loss of interest and the peril of permanent loss of the money itself. The process of hiding and hoarding increases as the actual need for money becomes more pressing. When business is booming and times are flush the doubtful and timid are tempted to come forth with their hidden treasure to participate in the alluring profits of the hour, thereby stimulating business in spasmodic fashion for speculative purposes.

Frightened by the first of evil signs, the money of the timid flies to hiding again and the unnatural superstructure it helped to erect quickly falls, and, unhappily, homes and fortunes are too often buried in the ruins. Such ups and downs have been the curse of the country from the beginning.

A very superficial investigation will suffice to show that destructive contraction is brought about by the simultaneous withdrawal of a large number of comparatively small sums. The great operators in our commercial and industrial enterprises are the largest borrowers of money. They can not hoard, because in the very nature of things they can not keep an adequate sum of money on hand at any time to instantly discharge all their obligations.

The banks can not hide their money, because they never have a sufficient amount on hand to pay their depositors. The banker is really a borrower, depending on the law of average resulting from normal conditions for such profit as can be legitimately made. It has been charged that the bankers in certain financial centers hoarded money during the recent panic, and the charge is probably true in a certain sense. Loaning was discontinued, collections were made wherever possible, and payments of money were restricted too often in a high-handed and arbitrary manner, but still it must be borne in mind that no bank in the country was able even by the drastic measures employed to accumulate anything like a sufficient sum to pay off its depositors. After collecting all they could, and keeping all they got, they still remained indebted to the forbearance of depositors for the continuance of their existence. The financial stringency resulted from the almost universal disposition of every institution and every individual to lay hold of every dollar possible and to retain the dollar in possession until compelled by necessity to let it go. It was a season of great peril, and the peril was born of shattered confidence. Faith in the Government remained unimpaired throughout. The disorder from which we suffered proceeded from widespread distrust of the ability of the banks and debtors generally to meet their obligations. It is well to remember that the withdrawal from circulation of 10 extra dollars by each of our population will produce a financial crisis at any time, and as long as the people remain without any place wherein they may deposit small sums with a feeling of absolute security we will be in danger of violent and unexpected contraction of the circulating medium.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. CARTER. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. BACON. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill, but I understand from what the Senator has said this morning that there is a provision in the bill requiring that money deposited with the postal authorities shall be deposited in the local banks. The point upon which I wish to ask information of the Senator is this: The Senator of course will recall the fact that under our national banking system certain reserves are required to be kept, but that a very large proportion of those reserves—I have forgotten the exact amount, but it is a very large proportion of them—is authorized to be deposited in certain banks in the larger cities; the so-called "reserve cities." The reserves of banks all over the country are authorized to be sent to New York and Chicago and elsewhere. The point upon which I wish to ask information is this: The only object in the requirement for the deposit of this money in local banks is that it shall remain for use in local business and commerce.

Is there any provision in the bill which would prevent that money, when thus deposited in local banks, from being treated as the larger portion of the reserve is now treated, and sent from the localities to the large cities for deposit?

Mr. CARTER. The bill does not venture to offer any amendment to existing banking laws.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me. I am not speaking about an amendment to the existing banking laws. I refer to the provisions in the existing banking laws only by way of illustration. I wish to ask for information whether there is any provision in this bill which would require, as is required in the case of a part of the reserves, that they shall be kept in the local banks, or whether under the provisions of this bill it would be competent for the banks as soon as they receive the money from the postal authorities to immediately send it for deposit to New York and elsewhere, and thus defeat the purpose of the bill as to local deposits?

Mr. CARTER. The bill provides the rate of interest, but does not undertake to provide to whom the bank shall loan the money or whether it shall be sent——

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of loans, but of deposits. I am asking whether there is anything in the bill which would prevent the local banks from immediately transferring the deposits to the great money centers?

Mr. CARTER. There is nothing in the bill to that effect.

Mr. BACON. Therefore that could be done?

Mr. CARTER. Of course.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator from Montana a question? I take it the understanding and plan are that the money shall be in a certain sense like the money now handled through the post-offices on postal orders. To-day one office or bank may have the money and to-morrow there may be a change to another bank. It will be checked against by removals from one bank to another as a man may move from one town to another, and so forth.

Mr. CARTER. There is no provision in the bill for transferring a deposit or postal-order account from one post-office to another. If the depositor desires to transfer his account from Washington to Alexandria, it will be necessary for him to close the account in Washington and to open one in Alexandria. He would not be authorized to open an account in Alexandria until the Washington account had been closed.

Mr. WARREN. I have not examined the bill, but I had assumed it was liable to transfers of some kind.

Mr. CARTER. To return to the text, by the so-called "Aldrich-Vreeland bill" five hundred millions of emergency currency is provided to fill the vacuum which may be caused in the future by the hoarding of money. It is hoped by all and confidently believed by many that the presence of such an available resource will so far inspire public confidence as to obviate the necessity for any call upon it; but I submit to you that even this large emergency fund does not cure the disorder, but only provides a palliative intended to stay its ravages.

A depository for small savings in which everyone, high and low, great and small, will under all circumstances and conditions have abiding faith, will by reason of that faith insure the accumulation in the depository of the coin and currency which is constantly in hiding and also collect together the very large aggregate made up of the vast number of small sums which periodically retreat from the business firing line when signs of danger appear. With such depositories as widespread as the jurisdiction of the Government and easily accessible in every locality, the tin can, the old stocking, and the hole in the ground will go out of commission as hiding places for money.

In connection with this system of depositories we will have a safe and secure method for returning the money accumulated immediately to the channels of trade, thus striking at the root of the most serious disorder affecting our financial, commercial, and industrial progress. The useful and desirable end suggested will, I confidently assert, be attained under the provisions of this bill.

Generally speaking, the postal funds are used by the respective governments, and in this particular the legislation proposed differs materially, for the funds will be at once deposited in the banks at a moderate rate of interest and as near as may be practicable in the community where received. This provision meets and at once disposes of the oft-repeated suggestion that the system would result in the accumulation of the people's savings in the National Treasury or in the large financial centers. It may occur to some that banks in certain localities would feel disinclined to pay the 2½ per cent interest required by the proposed law. In such a contingency the deposits would be placed in banks willing to pay the rate at some other point in the same county or State, or, as a last resort, the board of trustees would be authorized to invest the funds in national, state, county, or municipal bonds, but I submit to you that this last resort would scarcely, if ever, be reached when the nature of the deposit is considered. It would be one of the most reliable deposits a bank could secure, because it would constantly increase rather than diminish, and in times of financial disturbance the increase would be in proportion to the intensity of the panic.

A panic being precipitated, no one can doubt that the small depositors, frightened into withdrawing from the banks, would hand their money to the postmaster, and that official would at the close of the day return the money thus received to the nearest bank; and, in consequence, while the financial institutions of the town were being weakened by withdrawals they would be strengthened to a corresponding degree by daily deposits. The process will keep the relief fund in the neighborhood ready for loaning on good security, whereas in the absence of the postal system the money withdrawn would for the time being disappear from circulation. Large depositors could not avail themselves of postal depositories at any time, because of the limit of $100 per month and $500 in all to the credit of a single account, but in times of panic large depositors can always be satisfied with collateral security, whereas it is impossible to deal on that basis with a large number of small depositors.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me? I am not asking this in any spirit of controversy, but really for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURKETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I have listened to the Senator with a great deal of interest. The Senator has given this subject considerable study, and I should like to ask him a question. If this system is good for small deposits, why is it not good for large deposits? I presume there is a reason why the distinction is made, and I wish the Senator would give it.

Mr. CARTER. If we obligated the postmasters of the country to receive large deposits, we would thus be making the post-office system a convenience for large commercial transactions. That is foreign to the purposes of this bill. We do not propose to invade the commercial field at all, or to make this system a convenience for commercial transactions. The primary purpose of the bill is to encourage thrift among the people by furnishing a safe place for the deposit of small rather than large sums.

Mr. BACON. I understand that, Mr. President, and I repeat that what I say is not for the purpose of controversy, but in order to get light. I understand that to be one of the prime objects of the proposed system. But at the same time the Senator has been discussing the great advantages that would result in times of panic by the machinery under which, even if the money were withdrawn from the banks, it would be deposited with the postal authorities, and then go back into the banks, and thereby panics would be averted, and the evil effects of panics largely obviated or removed.

I repeat I am not asking the question for purposes of controversy, but in order to get the Senator's views. Why, if that is a good plan as regards small transactions, would it not be a good plan with respect to large transactions? I am not speaking as to the primary object being to handle small amounts.

Mr. CARTER. The discussion of that feature of the case would bring us into the broad domain of banking and currency and the great commercial transactions of the country. As before stated, the prime purpose of this measure is to accommodate people of small means and to interfere as little as possible with the commercial operations of the country. To the extent that the banks of the country are to be affected at all, my conviction is that they will be beneficially affected by the operations of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Even on his last statement, if the banks are to be benefited by it, would they not be benefited to an increasing degree if large amounts were accepted, and if it were not limited to small amounts?

Mr. CARTER. The present bill creates a bureau or division in the Post-Office Department which is a mere incident to its general operation. The Senator can readily realize that if the amounts to be received on deposit were unlimited, we would make banking the principal business of the Post-Office Department in a very short time, and it is not the intention to do this.

As before stated, for many years in every part of the United States laboring people, doubtful of banks, have been in the habit of purchasing post-office orders in their own names and paying the commission, which amounts to 30 cents a hundred, and holding the orders for a year, only to repeat the process for the year following. The Postmaster-General estimates that in 1907 Italian laborers in this country remitted $19,000,000 to the postal savings banks of Italy for safe-keeping. The sums sent abroad to other countries can not be ascertained, but that the aggregate amount is large does not admit of question. Immigrants coming to our shores, unfamiliar with our banking system, and frightened by reports of bank failures from time to time, naturally return their money to the postal savings institutions at their former homes with the confident assurance that what they earn and save will be secure and available when needed. The money earned in this country belongs here, and it behooves us to give such assurance to the toiling millions as will induce them to save and deposit rather than to squander, hide, or send their earnings abroad.

The committee's report on this bill discloses the measures taken by foreign countries to induce their former citizens or subjects to forward their earnings to the postal banks of their mother country. As a rule commercial banks do not court the business of the wage-earners, to whom the postal depositories would especially appeal, and we have not a sufficient number of savings banks in the country to accommodate the worthy, struggling people who seek to save and are entitled to the necessary facilities accompanied by absolute safety. In New England, where savings banks are numerous, every other inhabitant has a savings account, whereas in the South, the Middle, and Western States there is only one savings account to every 157 of the population. The financial strength of New England is very largely attributable to the savings banks, through which the people of small means are enabled to cooperate for the common good.

The banking power of New England, even from the commercial point of view, has been steadily strengthened and increased by the presence of the savings bank, and what the savings banks of New England have done for that section of our country but duplicates what has been accomplished in other countries through the operation of the postal savings system. The banking power of Great Britain has increased and the stability of the financial structure has been improved by the process of making all the money of the country available all the time for the transaction of business. True it is that the postal savings of the United Kingdom are invested in the government securities, but if these small sums, gathered through the post-office, had not been accumulated for governmental use the current banking funds would have been burdened with the maintenance of the nation's credit, without the aid of the savings of the poor.

An examination of the exhibits attached to the committee's report will, I think, demonstrate to the mind of the most skeptical that, instead of impairing, the postal savings system will in the course of normal operation add to the volume of bank deposits. He who deems his dollar or two unworthy of a trip to the bank may fall into the habit of depositing in the post-office, with no thought of a rate of interest; but when the same individual has accumulated a few hundred dollars he is quite likely to think about the earning power of the accumulation; and as the government rate is very low compared with the rate paid by the banks, the higher rate of interest will entice the account away from the postal depository.

This has been the experience in all countries where the postal savings system has been in operation any length of time. The record shows that the deposits of postal savings increase in proportion to population up to a certain standard and does not go beyond that; that as persons acquire an accumulation of a few hundred dollars they invest in a home or invest in a security or deposit their money in a bank willing to pay a higher rate of interest than the postal depository pays.

Private institutions never can afford such accommodations as the Government can extend through the Post-Office Department, because the initial cost and the cost of operation would be absolutely prohibitive. The post-offices will be continued in operation whether used as depository offices or not. Who would think of repealing the law providing for the registry of letters or the sale of money orders for the accommodation of patrons of the post-office? Post-offices would be conducted whether they sold money orders or not, and so they will be conducted at the same expense to the postal revenues with or without postal depositories.

The proposed system will be self-sustaining and will not take one dollar from the postal funds; on the contrary, it is believed that some slight profit will accrue to the postal revenues from the operation. The well-being of society has always been and always will be promoted by the development of thrift amongst the body of the people, and that which tends to encourage thrift not only insures a wider and better distribution of the comforts of life, but also guarantees the stability of government and the preservation of law and order.

The business man makes due calculation on the hazards of business, and ordinary risks, including possible loss of his bank balance, are taken into account in the fixing of prices and commissions. The laboring man, on the other hand, having but his day's service to sell, can not be expected to view with the same complacency the possibility of losing his hard-earned savings through a bank failure. For him no profit or commission may be drawn upon to create a reserve to meet such a contingency. The loss with him is irreparable and complete, to the extent that repayment fails. No wonder that a man thus situated declines to take a chance. No wonder the man whose hard-earned savings and wages are swept away in a financial crisis blames the Government, the bank officers, and the community. The wage-earner who wishes to save a part of every day's earnings ought not to be left by his Government to any chance of loss. The saving disposition should be encouraged by the State to the extent of holding out the incentive of absolute safety.

In conclusion I cite Senators to the compilation of historical data, facts and figures presented in the report of the committee supporting the bill. In the historical review will be found an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Commons in 1888 by the late Mr. Gladstone, who said:

The post-office savings bank is the most important institution which has been created in the last fifty years for the welfare of the people and the State. I consider the act of 1861, which called the institution into existence, as the most useful and fruitful of my long career.

This testimony from such a high source, given after the savings banks had been in operation in the United Kingdom for twenty-seven years, should dissipate our doubts and assure us of the solidity of the ground upon which we stand.

We are not called upon to embark in an experimental venture, but rather to heed the call of the great body of the American people for a service which has proven successful, beneficial, and satisfactory under every variety of government, climate, and territorial jurisdiction known to men. The petitions of the people and the recommendations of high officials persistently addressed to Congress for half a century, supplemented by the solemn promise of all the political parties during the last presidential campaign, should no longer be treated with indifference by the Congress.

The report, Mr. President, presented by the committee furnishes a line of exhibits which will prove of very great interest and value to anyone inclined to pursue inquiries on this subject further, and in order that the report may be available at all times I ask that it be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator that I think we ought to have additional copies of the report in its usual form. There is going to be a great demand for it, beyond a question, and I would suggest the printing of a thousand additional copies.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee will get additional copies printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Utah suggests that the Committee on Printing will get additional copies printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the report of the committee may be printed in the RECORD following his remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 125, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

[Report to accompany S. 5876.]

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, having under consideration Senate bill 5876, reports the same back to the Senate with the following amendments, to wit:

In line 11, page 2, strike out the words "each and."

In line 17, page 7, strike out the words "his or her" before the word "deposit" and insert in lieu thereof the word "any."

In line 1, page 9, strike out the word "and" before the word "improper" and in lieu thereof insert a comma; in line 7, same page, strike out the words "and other;" in line 7, same page, add "s" to the word "purpose;" in line 12, same page, strike out the words "and other."

As thus amended the committee recommends that the bill do pass.

For the information of the Senate the committee respectfully submits the following facts and figures in support of the bill:

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

HISTORICAL.

The proposition to use post-offices as depositories for savings was first made in England as long ago as 1807. Mr. Whitbread, a member of Parliament, introduced during that year in the House of Commons a bill for the benefit of the working classes, the guiding principle of which was that of self-help. Mr. Whitbread considered it wiser to assist people to advance their own interests than to extend help by the giving of alms. His meritorious scheme, however, was received with almost universal disfavor. The press of the time ridiculed his ideas and treated them as altogether impracticable and visionary. There were then very few savings banks, only 11 being in existence throughout the civilized world.

In December, 1838, the practice of transmitting money by means of postal-money orders throughout the United Kingdom was authorized. By that time the advocates of postal savings banks had become quite numerous, and they found in the successful workings of the money-order system one of their most telling arguments.

It is interesting to note that the plan of postal savings banks which finally was adopted was proposed by one engaged in commercial banking—Charles W. Sikes, a bookkeeper of the "joint-stock" bank at Huddersfield, Yorkshire. He presented his composition on the subject to that eminent statesman, W. E. Gladstone, then chancellor of the exchequer. He cited many pertinent facts tending to show the need of postal banks, among them being that, although private savings banks had greatly increased in number and deposits, they did not come within the reach of the common or most numerous classes of the people. This, he stated, could be done only by the post-offices, which were accessible to every workman. Mr. Sikes was encouraged and seconded in his efforts by Mr. Rowland Hill, who had been appointed general secretary of the post-office for life in recognition of his valuable services as a postal reformer. Mr. Gladstone also eloquently supported the bill, which became a law in May, 1861, and on September 1 of the same year the British Post-Office Savings Bank came into being.

It is well known that Mr. Gladstone was before the English public prominently as a constructive statesman for many years. His opinion of the importance and value of postal savings banks is best given in his own words, uttered in the House of Commons in the year 1888 amid universal applause. He said:

"The post-office savings bank is the most important institution which has been created in the last fifty years for the welfare of the people and the State. I consider the act of 1861 which called the institution into existence as the most useful and fruitful of my long career."

Charles Sikes, actively concerned in the adoption by Great Britain of the postal savings bank, was not unrewarded. He was knighted in 1881 upon the recommendation of Mr. Gladstone, then premier. He was appointed to an important office under the Government, and public subscriptions even were made and a valuable gift tendered him in appreciation of his good work.

The British Post-Office Savings Bank has been a success from the day of its establishment. The first institution of its kind, it has grown from year to year until in 1908 it carried accounts to the number of 11,018,251 and had total deposits of $781,794,533, the average holding of each depositor being $70.95.

Almost every civilized nation, with the exception of Germany, which has a splendid system of municipal savings banks, and the United States, which now has the matter under consideration, followed the lead of Great Britain. The years in which postal savings banks were established in the various foreign countries are shown in Table 1, an appendix to this report.

The benevolent savings bank found no permanent foothold in America until 1816, when the Philadelphia Savings Fund Society was organized. That society had an initial fund of $250, made up of $10 contributions from 25 public-spirited citizens of the Quaker City. It was founded upon principles which have stood the test of time, for it is to-day the oldest institution of its kind in America. Its deposits total more than $90,000,000. It is thus apparent that the savings-bank business had its inception in benevolent motives, and that it is a business of great human interest, not having the same objects which necessarily must govern the bank handling only commercial accounts.

The postal savings-bank system, wherever operated, has been found a most important and valuable adjunct to private banking establishments. Contrary to the belief of some, it is a help, not a hindrance, to private enterprise. Postal deposits apparently increase, until they reach a certain point, and then remain nearly stationary, which would seem to indicate two things: First, that the money which has been gotten at is mostly that which can not be reached by the private banks, and has been drawn from places of concealment or collected in extremely small sums; and second, that the patrons, having accumulated a little money, learn its earning power and decide to place it where it will yield greater returns. Especial attention is invited at this juncture to the following, giving in even millions the deposits in the postal and other banks of Canada:

1903	$424,000,000	$41,000,000
1904	470,000,000	45,000,000
1905	531,000,000	45,000,000
1906	606,000,000	46,000,000
1907	655,000,000	47,000,000

* Figures not available.

Thus it is seen that while deposits in the chartered banks of Canada have grown consistently, postal savings deposits, after remaining practically at a standstill for an appreciable period, have actually declined in the last year.

The postal savings-bank business of Great Britain also has been more nearly stationary in recent years than is commonly supposed. Proof of this statement and of the remarkable stability of the British Post-Office Savings Bank is given in Table 7 of this report. In this connection the postmaster-general of Great Britain, in his report for the year ended December 31, 1908, says with respect to withdrawals from the post-office savings banks:

"The amount withdrawn during the year exceeded the amount deposited by £624,618. In 1907 the amount withdrawn exceeded the amount deposited by £2,216,344."

The steady gain in total deposits which has occurred, therefore, is due in part to interest credited, as may be noted from the succeeding paragraph, which emanates from the same authority:

"The interest credited to depositors in 1908 was £3,772,755, as compared with £3,719,975 in 1907; and the total sum standing to the credit of depositors on savings-bank account on the 31st of December, 1908, was £160,648,214, an increase of £3,148,137 in the year. In 1907 the increase was £1,503,631 only."

Had it not been for interest accretion, therefore, the total due depositors at the end of 1907 and 1908 would have exhibited a falling off as compared with previous years.

SALIENT FEATURES OF THE PROPOSED BILL.

Briefly, the proposition for the opening of postal savings depositories in the United States is as follows:

The Postmaster-General will designate as rapidly as consistent with good administration the money-order offices as places for the receipt of savings deposits, and he is empowered to so designate such other offices as he deems advisable. There are approximately 50,000 money-order post-offices, so that the Postmaster-General may at first restrict the depositories to post-offices of the presidential grade, of which there are about 7,500. Accounts may be opened by any person 10 years or more of age. Married women may have accounts free from interference by their husbands. No person can have more than one account. The minimum deposit which will be accepted is $1. Interest is to be allowed at a rate not exceeding 2 per cent per annum, an evidence of the intention of the Government not to compete with banks. No account may have a total credit exceeding $500, exclusive of accumulated interest, and not more than $100 may be deposited in any one month. Withdrawals may be made under rules and regulations to be prescribed. Postal savings funds, so far as practicable, will be deposited by the Postmaster-General in banks located nearest to the post-offices at which the money is received at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum.

The bill does not undertake to prescribe administrative details for the reason that it is believed wiser and far more prudent to leave such details to be worked out by the board of trustees in the light of experience. A rigid rule of law might greatly hamper administrative work, detract from the efficiency of the system, increase its cost, and greatly retard improvement. All such details will be provided by the board under authority of that portion of section 1 of the bill which provides that—

"All regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed by said board of trustees, and any general regulation prescribed by the Postmaster-General under authority of this act shall be subject to the approval of said board."

OUTLINE OF THE SYSTEMS ADOPTED BY GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND AUSTRIA.

Appendixes A, B, and C give in general terms the conditions surrounding the operation of postal savings banks in Great Britain, France, and Austria. It should be borne in mind that the Austrian Government has instituted a system of checking accounts which never would find favor in this country and which is totally foreign to the present proposition. It really is not a part of the Austrian postal savings system, but is so intimately connected with it that it is impossible to describe the one without going into more or less detail as to the other.

The British system more nearly approximates the plan proposed for the United States than that of any other country, yet it is not controlled by all the restrictions which would obtain here. Furthermore, British deposits are centralized, whereas S. 5876 provides for the immediate redeposit in the same neighborhood of all money received at postal savings banks.

FEATURES OF THE POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Postal savings made up of money not reached by commercial banks.—In order to demonstrate that postal savings deposits are almost invariably composed of new money, an investigation must be made of the classes of people who mostly patronize them. A recent report from Austria is illuminating. It states:

"If the depositors are classed according to social position and profession the largest participation is by children and students, who form 44 per cent of the depositors. Artisans and laborers, with 14.3 per cent, are more numerously represented than any other calling. Domestic servants also, with 8 per cent, form a not inconsiderable fraction of the clientele of the postal savings bank; 4.5 per cent of the deposit books belong to married women and widows; 2.1 per cent of the depositors are military men. State and parochial officers represent 1.5 per cent. The remaining 25.6 per cent are distributed among the members of a great variety of professions and callings, none of which, however, is especially predominant. These statistics prove that the savings bank finds special favor with the young. The number of children and school children who, in 1893, made request for deposit books was 54,713."

Ratio of postal savings to other bank deposits.—As a rule the deposits in postal savings banks form but a small part of the total savings deposits, as is indicated by the following table:

Savings deposits in foreign countries, 1905.

[c] "Joint stock" banks. The banks of the United Kingdom which accept only savings deposits do not report on their operations, so that statistics concerning them are very incomplete.
[d] In chartered banks. On January 1, 1906, there were 35 incorporated banks making returns to the Government, with 1,800 branches.

In France the postal or "national" savings banks and the "ordinary" savings banks are so closely associated that they are covered by the same act. In that country the words "savings bank" can not be used in the title of any institution which does not comply in all particulars with the law of July 20, 1895, which practically means that all savings banks are national in scope. In Italy, Japan, New Zealand, and some other countries where the government engages actively in the banking business, postal savings approach or exceed in amount the deposits in other savings banks.

Immigrants and foreign-born Americans deposit in the postal banks of other countries.—Investigation discloses that the savings deposits of Italy are made up in part of money sent home by Italians living abroad, as is aptly illustrated by this excerpt from a book on the Italian post-office savings bank by Alberto Gaviani, published in 1902:

"Measures must be taken to induce the numerous Italians abroad to invest their savings in the Italian post-office savings bank. The steps taken in this direction are insufficient. Small savings banks must be opened abroad, these banks to be managed free by honorable and solvent Italians and placed under the supervision of the nearest Italian consul or of the manager of the nearest branch of the Bank of Naples, as this bank is already authorized now by the Government to collect the savings of Italians abroad and invest them in the domestic post-office savings bank."

The practice of banking abroad is by no means confined to Italian residents. A number of European and other governments make special efforts to procure postal deposits from America.

Instances also have been found of Americans living near our northern border intrusting their savings to the Canadian postal savings bank.

No accurate estimate can be made of the amount of money which is taken out of this country annually in this way. Much of it is sent by bank draft, express order, etc. The following quotation, taken from a financial statement of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department for the quarter ended September 30, 1909, tells how much is sent abroad in the shape of money orders, and gives the rate of increase over the corresponding quarter of the previous year as 25 per cent. It will be noted that the balance in the international money-order business is overwhelmingly in favor of foreign countries, and at the present time amounts to approximately $75,000,000 annually.

"During the quarter ended September 30, 1909, 846,883 international money orders, valued at $20,972,882.65, were issued in the United States payable in foreign countries. For the same period 98,164 international money orders, valued at $2,402,185.71, issued in foreign countries were paid in the United States. The balance of $18,570,696.94 in favor of foreign countries was settled principally by the purchase and remittance of foreign exchange. This represents an increase of $3,773,714.09, or more than 25 per cent, as compared with the corresponding quarter of the preceding fiscal year.

Interest rate and limitation of accounts.—The interest rate varies from 2.04 per cent in Italy to 4 per cent in Bulgaria and 4.8 per cent in Japan. The Italian interest rate has fluctuated considerably. From 1876 to 1878 it was 3 per cent; 1879 to 1886, 3½ per cent; 1887 to 1895, 3¼ per cent; 1896 to 1897, 3 per cent; 1898 to 1901, 2.88 per cent; 1902 to 1904, 2.76 per cent. Austria pays 3 per cent; France and Great Britain, 2½ per cent; Sweden, 3.6 per cent; and Canada, 3 per cent.

There is some limit on the maximum of one account in all countries. It varies from $289.50 in France to $3,000 in Canada, and practically the same amount in other British colonies.

Complete information as to rates of interest and other pertinent details is shown in Table 3.

POSTAL DEPOSITORIES WOULD NOT INJURIOUSLY AFFECT THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Whether postal savings depositors would result in an increase or a falling off of revenue is a question which naturally presents itself. The following letter from Postmaster-General Hitchcock enlarges upon this phase of the matter, and is therefore quoted in full.

JANUARY 8, 1910.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your personal inquiry, I beg to state that, in my view, operated under a suitable law and controlled by proper regulations, postal savings depositories would not in the long run impose any additional financial burden upon the Government. In this connection I said in my annual report:

"Under a statute and regulations properly drawn and enforced, a postal savings-bank system in this country would be self-supporting. A fractional margin between the rate of interest paid to the depositors and the rate realized by the Government on redeposits would easily cover the cost of conducting the business. Only a moderate original outlay would be required for special equipment. Improvements in the postal service now being made should place the department in such condition that the additional work and responsibility incident to the operation of postal savings banks could be readily assumed."

The margin referred to between the interest paid to the Government and that which it in turn would allow depositors should be sufficient to defray all charges, including the necessary initial expense of preparing blanks, books, and instructions. The rapid extension of the money-order feature of the postal service, until at the present time 51,824 offices out of a total of 59,578 are equipped to issue and pay money orders, might be regarded in the nature of a valuable preliminary step in preparing the service to undertake the additional duties and responsibilities which necessarily would be entailed. At each of the 51,824 money-order post-offices there is presumably at least one person competent to undertake postal savings business; and, except in the case of offices below the presidential grade, their doing so would not necessarily add greatly to the cost of the service. At some of the larger offices additional clerks would be necessary. It is impossible to foretell with any degree of accuracy just how many would be required. In the nature of things their number and total compensation would fluctuate with the volume of business transacted, and should not be allowed to pass the limits dictated by prudent management. The employment of officers and clerks at the central office would be governed by similar considerations.

It is not believed that postal savings depositories would interfere in any way with the ordinary operations of the postal service. In this respect comparison may, with propriety, be made to the money-order service, which certainly has had no deleterious effect.

Predicated upon the experience of other countries and taking into consideration the fact that in all probability a lower rate of interest will be allowed here than in any other instance, I consider it safe to say that a system of postal savings depositories, wisely planned and administered, will prove to be a success from a financial standpoint.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK, Postmaster-General.

Hon. THOMAS H. CARTER,
United States Senate.

As the Postmaster-General well states, exact figures can not be given concerning the cost of postal savings depositories prior to their establishment. It is possible, however, to learn a great deal concerning the financial success or failure of the postal savings systems of other countries. There seems to have been little effort in any country to convert the postal bank into a money-making enterprise, yet no instance can be found, taking into consideration the transactions as a whole, where it has not been made to pay its way. Certainly with the unexampled opportunities for the safe investment of money which present themselves on every side in this country the American system should be a success in this respect. Extracts indicative of the gain or loss in operating the postal banks of Great Britain and Austria-Hungary follow:

EXPENSES OF OPERATION IN GREAT BRITAIN.

The claim having been put forth that the post-office savings bank of Great Britain has been a losing venture from its inception, a statement in the premises was obtained from the postmaster-general of Great Britain. Revised in accordance with the latest information, it is given below:

Mr. Sydney Buxton, the British postmaster-general, states in explanation of the foregoing:

"The deficiency during the years 1896–1899 was due to a rapid increase in the price of consols, and when the price dropped in 1900 the balance of the year's business was again in favor of the state. It so continued until 1903, when the rate of interest on the nominal value of consols was reduced to 2½ per cent, the same rate which the bank was paying and still continues to pay to its customers.

"It must be remembered that although consols, at their present price, can be bought to yield more than 2½ per cent, a great part of the savings-bank money was invested when the price was a long way above par and the stock was a 2¾ per cent stock.

"The change in the rate of interest had, of course, a considerable effect on the finances of the bank; and the expenses of management have each year since exceeded the margin of profit accruing to the Government; but the deficit could be put an end to at any time, if the Government so desired, by slight reduction in the rate of interest allowed to depositors or even by some modification of the period during which money must remain undisturbed in the bank in order to earn interest."

A PROFIT IN AUSTRO-HUNGARY.

In order to cover any loss which the savings bank might incur, a reserve fund has been created from the profits of the bank and which has long reached the legal maximum of 4,000,000 ($812,000) crowns. The balance which arises in the savings bank flows to the post-office; in 1906 tiamounted to $276,484.

[From L'Union Postale, December, 1908.]

THE POST-OFFICE SAVINGS BANK OF HUNGARY IN 1907.

The total receipts of the savings bank amounted to $1,380,711 and the expenditure, including a sum of $575,325 due to depositors as interests, to $957,186, giving thus a balance of receipts over expenditure of $423,525. The reserve fund having already reached the maximum fixed by the law, this sum was remitted to the state treasury. The working expenses alone being $381,861 in amount and the official transactions 13,669,945 in number, the average cost of each transaction was $0.0279.

EFFECT UPON ESTABLISHED BANKING INTERESTS.

Nearly every contention which has been urged here adverse to the establishment of postal savings banks was enlarged upon during the discussion in England, which started more than a century ago and ended in 1861 with the passage of the postal savings bank law. It has been stated that postal savings banks would cause an immediate shrinkage in the deposits of private banks. This statement is best refuted by the data given in Tables 10 and 11, which show for a period of years the deposits in British and Canadian postal and commercial banks. These tables would seem to indicate that the original depositors in postal savings banks, for some reason or other, would not place their money in the regular banks. But as they accumulated more and more and became familiar with banking operations, they learned that greater returns, with little or no risk, could be had elsewhere, and they were converted into bank patrons of the most desirable kind.

Every banker knows how many men there are in his community, some of them more or less actively engaged in business, who have no bank accounts and conduct all their transactions upon a strictly cash basis. Most of these, once they acquired the habit of banking their money, would see, as they now do not, the advantages of having a savings or checking account. Others, such as school children and day laborers, are somewhat diffident about presenting their small savings at the counter of the local bank, but they would have no embarrassment in opening an account with their postmaster, with whom they are already acquainted in most instances and from whom they have been accustomed to purchase stamps in limited quantities. There are approximately 60,000 postmasters and 40,000 rural carriers throughout the United States, each of whom could be made an ideal agent for the collection of small savings. Under the proposed law the money so received would be turned over at once to a local bank, rendering it available for business purposes as it never could be by any other means. The postal depository would not furnish the same accommodations available at private banks, in that checks would not be cashed, bills of exchange would not be sold, notes would not be discounted, nor would there exist many other facilities peculiar to commercial banking.

There are undoubtedly many sections of this country in which there are no banking facilities at the present time and where there will not be sufficient business to warrant the establishment of a private bank for many years to come. It has been alleged that some of those in favor of postal savings banks have cited figures submitted by the Comptroller of the Currency which were incomplete and therefore gave an inaccurate idea of the real distribution of banks throughout the United States. There is no reason why the most ardent advocate of postal depositories should misrepresent in this regard, and the figures in question probably were used for the reason that they were the best available at the time. Very recently, however, the National Monetary Commission has compiled a special report relating to the banks of the United States which is most interesting. It covers the ground far more fully than anything hitherto attempted. The Monetary Commission estimates the number of banks and banking firms in the United States at 25,000. Of this number reports were obtained from all but 2,500, the omissions being chiefly of concerns whose business is confined to brokerage and exchange. The nonreporting institutions were located as follows:

New England States	243
Eastern States	1,015
Southern States	251
Middle Western States	891
Western States	69
Pacific States	51

The number of banks reporting was 22,491, classified as follows:

National banks		6,883
State banks		11,319
Mutual savings banks	642
Stock savings banks	1,061
Total savings banks		1,703
Private banks		1,497
Loan and trust companies		1,079
		22,491

From this report it appears that we have in the United States about one bank for every 4,000 of the population. This scant supply of banking accommodations is somewhat aggravated by the concentration of the vast majority of the banks and the banking capital near the centers of population, leaving large sections of the country and millions of people destitute of needful banking facilities.

Detailed information concerning deposits in the banks of the United States is given in Table 6.

It is the intention to make the rate of interest so low and so to restrict the maximum amount to be received from any one depositor that there will be no incentive to patronize the postal savings bank at the expense of private establishments. On the contrary, as already indicated, the post-offices and rural routes throughout the land would serve, in effect, as feeders for commercial banks. There is not enough business to warrant the banks employing special agents to work the territory which the Government necessarily covers, and will continue to cover, whether or not postal savings banks are instituted. There seems to be no good reason why the money which admittedly can be taken on deposit by the postal department should not be procured. For the most part, it could be placed with banks as time deposits, thus accommodating the banking fraternity on the one hand and the people on the other.

Many bankers who have investigated the question thoroughly have given it their unqualified support. How such bankers regard the proposition is well shown in the annexed copy of a letter received at the Post-Office Department from Mr. G. Gunby Jordan, president Third National Bank, Columbus, Ga., and president of the Columbus Clearing-House Association:

"I have also had the pleasure of carefully reading your recommendations as to a postal savings bank and the redepositing of these funds under certain conditions with the national banks in the same locality from which the funds are obtained, at a rate of interest which would reimburse the Government or make some money. I approve of this most heartily.

"As the president of a savings bank and as the president of a national bank I think it is an admirable arrangement, knowing, as I do, from an experience dating back prior to the panic of 1873, that a great many savings-bank depositors feel that nothing but the Government is safe in time of trouble; and they would be perfectly content with 2 per cent, or even less, interest if they knew that the Government were responsible to them.

"As it is now, these timid people withdraw and hide their deposits, very often losing their lives as a penalty, or losing the money from fire or theft, tying up the basis of credit which the banks have heretofore extended, and all in all injuring themselves and their fellow-men in the community.

"The plan suggested by you, in my opinion, is a wise one. These people would deposit their money with the Government. The Government in turn would deposit with the national banks, amply secured, and the same money would go back into circulation, serve the functions it was originally intended to serve, extend credit to the manufacturers, and the manufacturers in turn could keep these timid depositors at work and thus save them from themselves."

As to the probable effect of postal banks upon the banking business of the country, the letter herewith quoted, which appeared June 18, 1909, in the New York Herald, has a direct bearing:

To the EDITOR OF THE HERALD:

In further proof of the long-tried utility of postal savings banks and of the fact that their existence is not prejudicial to joint stock or private commercial or savings banks, let me cite a recent experience in Vancouver City, British Columbia, and in New South Wales, Australia. * * *

In both these countries an elaborate and eminently successful system of nongovernmental banking is carried on. Banking corporations are both numerous and flourishing. Spending several weeks lately in Vancouver, I lived in the Terminal City Club. In the writing room hung a plate-glass rack with blank checks for the convenience of members. I had the curiosity to count the number of different kinds and found there were thirteen distinct banking corporations in that city, apart from the many branches in the outskirts. It is safe to say that all these banks had savings departments. The magnificence of their various offices certainly gives some indication of the present extent and success of their business. * * *

If Vancouver banks have not suffered from Canada's long-time experience with postal savings banks, receiving individual deposits to the extent of $3,000, with interest not to exceed 4 per cent, is it likely American banks will sustain injury from a postal savings-bank system which in the Senate bill is limited to a $1,000 deposit for any individual and paying interest on $500 only, and that at 2 per cent?

What has been said of Vancouver could be repeated of Australia, Great Britain, and every other land which encourages thrift by a system of postal saving banks.

EDWARD BERWICK,
President Postal Progress League of California.

PACIFIC GROVE, CAL., June 7, 1909.

Those who hold the opinion that many bank depositors would withdraw their money and place it in postal depositories as soon as they were established do not reflect that the people who now have bank accounts are satisfied that their money is safe. If they felt otherwise they would not wait for the establishment of postal savings banks or upon any other contingency before applying for it.

The extract quoted below is from the Statesman's Yearbook for 1909. Although the transactions of the British Post-Office Savings Bank are more extensive than those of any other country, this fact does not appear to have had any bad effect upon the business of commercial banks.

"There were in June, 1908, 53 joint stock banks making returns in England and Wales, with 4,851 branches; 2 in the Isle of Man, with 7 branches; 1 in the Channel Islands; 10 in Scotland, 1,196 branches; and 9 in Ireland, 675 branches. There were 32 offices in London of colonial joint stock banks, with 2,546 branches; and 30 of foreign banks, with 1,419 branches. Of 11 private banks which made returns in England and Wales the deposits amounted to £26,842,410."

It is difficult to see how the total deposits in private banks could decline because of postal depositories when S. 5876 provides that the bulk of the money received must be immediately redeposited in local banks. How valuable to the banks this money would be in times of financial unrest is apparent.

NO INJURY TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

With reference to the claim that postal savings banks would antagonize private banks Postmaster-General Wannamaker, in a letter dated April 8, 1892, informed Hon. Philetus Sawyer, at that time chairman of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of the results of his investigations, as follows:

"Let me present a few statements in brief from letters which will be found printed in extenso in the appendix.

"The Swedish post-office department says, January 20, 1892, in reply to the inquiry, 'Has the Swedish postal savings bank, in its beginning or since, met with any opposition from private savings banks?'

"'As far as known, no opposition has been manifested at any time.'

"The Hungarian post-office department makes this statement, February 10, 1892:

"'The private savings banks can never see a competitor in the postal savings banks, because their organization is different and because they serve a different class of people. The postal savings banks have not exercised any injurious influence on the development of private savings banks, which is shown by the circumstance that since the establishment of postal savings banks the deposits in the private savings banks have not decreased, but increased very considerably, as has also the number of private savings banks. Thus, e. g., 30 new private savings banks have been established during 1886 to 1888, and quite a number in 1890.'

"The following statement, dated January 14, 1892, was received from the Italian postal administration:

"'There has never been any serious opposition to the establishment of the postal savings bank. In the beginning some apprehension was felt that the postal savings bank might injure the private institution of similar character, but this apprehension soon vanished, as it soon became apparent that each of the two kinds of institutions had its own circle of customers and did not interfere with each other. At present there are not a few localities where postal savings banks are in operation and flourish side by side with private savings banks. Special mention should here be made of the old, firmly established savings bank of Lombardi, which has its central office at Milan, and many branch offices throughout the entire Kingdom.'

"From the director-general of posts of Belgium, January 9, 1892:

"'As far as I know, the postal savings bank has never met with any opposition from private banks and similar institutions.'

"From the director-general of posts of the Netherlands, January 7, 1892:

"'When the postal savings bank service was inaugurated, it met with no opposition whatever upon the part of the banks.'

"From the post-office department of Austria, January 23, 1892:

"'No opposition to the postal savings bank has ever been manifested by the private savings banks in Austria.'

"From the director-general of posts, France, January 11, 1892:

"'Far from interfering with the private savings banks which existed prior to this date, this law contains a number of new provisions by which these banks have profited. Under the Empire, according to the legislation then in force, the private savings banks could not receive more than 300 francs from one person per week, and the account of one depositor could not exceed 1,000 francs, the only exception being made in case of mutual benefit societies, which could deposit amounts up to 8,000 francs. Minors and married women could, as a measure of toleration, open a bank account through the intervention of their teacher, their legal representative, or their husband, but they had no right to draw money without such intervention.

"'The law of April 9, 1881, raised the maximum of deposits to 2,000 francs, paid in one or several installments. It gave to minors and married women the right to make deposits and draw money without the intervention of their teacher, their legal representative, or the husband, except in cases where these persons raised objections. Minors can not, however, draw money without the intervention of the persons representing them until the completion of their sixteenth year.

"'The law of April 9, 1881, contains by way of safeguard a clause in virtue of which decrees issued by the council of state may in cases of force majeure, and especially during political or economical crises, authorize the savings banks not to pay out more than 50 francs to one person per two weeks.

"'All these provisions apply not only to the postal savings bank, but also to the private savings banks.

"'On the other hand, the postal savings bank has not been established with the view to compete with the private banks, but for the purpose to give savings banks to localities where they did not exist and where, probably, they would never have been established by private effort. Even communes where there is no post-office, and therefore no agency of the savings bank, are visited at least once a day by the rural letter carriers, who can serve as intermediaries between the post-offices and the depositors for making deposits. It may therefore be said that there is not a commune and not a hamlet in France where savings can not be collected.

"'The postal savings bank and the private savings banks do not exactly serve the same class of customers. The first mentioned offers especial advantages to economical persons who move about a good deal and who, therefore, appreciate the facility of making a deposit in one post-office and drawing it in some other office; the second, by reason of the higher rate of interest paid by them, are more advantageous to persons who always reside in one and the same place where they make their deposits and draw their money.

"'The postal savings bank only pays an interest of 3 per cent to depositors, whilst the private savings banks, whose relations with the treasury, represented by the Caisse des dépôts et consignations, have not been changed by the law of April 9, 1881, pay an interest of 3 francs 50 centimes, and even 3 francs 75 centimes, for 100 francs.

"'These reasons explain why the postal savings bank has not met with any opposition on the part of the private savings banks, whose depositors have not decreased in number since January 1, 1892, and whose operations are constantly increasing.

"'As regards the private banks which receive funds in account current, they have nothing to fear from the postal savings bank, which receives deposits from 1 franc upward, and even deposits less than 1 franc, in the shape of 5 and 10 centimes postage stamps, which the depositor pastes upon a card and which are accepted when their value has reached 1 franc. The operations of the postal savings bank relate principally to small amounts; and experience has shown that the postal savings bank does not in the least interfere with the development of the private banks, which receive larger deposits. The vast majority of the depositors in the postal savings banks consist of minors, laborers, clerks, etc., whilst the private banks have their depositors among persons of greater means.'

In reflecting upon the foregoing it should be remembered that the system of postal savings depositories advocated for the United States is far more conservative than that of any of the countries referred to.

Additional data in this direction is contained in the following, translated from the German:

[From Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft.]

"POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS. BY DR. FRITZ HEBER.

"Comparative summary.—With respect to the relation of postal savings banks to private banks it has been found everywhere that the former have not operated to the detriment of the latter; private banks progressed steadily everywhere, with the exception of England and Belgium, and in these countries on account of the abnormal conditions resulting from the failure of several large private banks. (The author appears to have considered only one kind of English private banks. As a matter of fact, the increase of deposits in private banks of all kinds in England has been great and uninterrupted.)

"Possible dangers of competition to private banks were obviated by the law which fixed the maximum rate of interest and amount of deposit at postal savings banks and limited each depositor to one account.

"Careful observation has shown that private banks have in the course of time profited by the institution of postal savings banks. It compelled them to establish branch banks, extend their business hours, and in general to offer their patrons more inducements and better facilities. There can be no doubt that such measures would tend to increase their own business interests. Furthermore, postal savings banks attract small deposits from the classes of people who are concerned more with the question of safety in depositing than with high rates of interest. This relieves private banks of the cost of handling these small accounts. It is safe to say that postal savings banks everywhere have benefited private banks and are a necessary supplement to them. They are intended primarily for the working classes, while private banks desire to do away with the handling of small accounts as their business interests extend.

"The maximum deposits in all countries are, therefore, with the exception of several in which private banks had not been established and where higher rates of interest were justified, very moderate. The rate of interest also was in all countries, with the exception of Japan, Russia, and Sweden, determined by the rates offered by private banks.

"Postal savings banks outnumber private banks only in England and Belgium, where private banks could not regain the confidence of the people, which had been forfeited as a result of various failures. The same conditions existed in Holland. The cause of the small number of private banks in Holland is not apparent, but is attributed to the fact that the larger portion of deposits are made by the rural classes, who do not have ready access to private banks. This class of people in Holland is very wealthy, as compared with the same class in other countries. In Canada and New Zealand private banks are outnumbered, for the reason that very few had been established prior to the institution of postal savings banks. In all other countries, however, private banks are in the majority.

"Purpose of postal savings banks.—As shown by the history of savings institutions, private banks were established for the purpose of inducing the poorer classes to lay aside small sums for cases of emergency and illness, to make them independent, and to give them the opportunity to receive interest on their surplus earnings. However, in the course of time small depositors were neglected more and more, and their patronage was considered very undesirable, owing to the large amount of work they occasioned. Postal savings banks therefore serve the purpose for which private banks were primarily intended, but which was lost sight of when larger business opportunities presented themselves."

POSTAL BANKS IN OPERATION IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Postal savings banks were established in the Philippines in 1906. They are increasing rapidly in popular favor and in the amount of business transacted. As shown by Appendix E, there were at the end of October, 1909, 9,970 accounts, which are classified according to nationality of depositors, as follows:

Americans	3,485
Filipinos	5,857
Europeans	337
Asiatics	230
Total personal accounts	9,909
Society accounts	61

The total deposits were $757,157, an average to each account of $75.95.

ATTITUDE OF THE PUBLIC.

The establishment of postal savings banks has been indorsed by the people through the political platforms of the two leading parties, and thus presented squarely to Congress in a way that demands attention and the most thoroughgoing investigation. Volumes of letters are sent daily to Washington which leave no room for doubt that the people are a unit in approving the suggested legislation. Many of our citizens are determined to secure in some form the guaranty of the Government that their savings will be returned to them upon demand. What better or safer guaranty could there be than that afforded by the postal savings bank?

SAVINGS INVESTED IN MONEY ORDERS.

In the absence of postal savings banks the people are buying money orders payable to themselves, intrusting their savings to the custody of the Post-Office Department without interest; and, in fact, actually paying a premium, in the shape of money-order fees, to insure their funds against any possibility of loss. Table 12 shows the extent of this practice, and that it is not confined to any particular section of the country.

In the course of a call made at the Post-Office Department May 14, 1908, the director of posts of the Panama Canal Zone remarked that, having made some inquiries as a result of his interest in the postal savings bank question, he had ascertained that nearly $300,000 had been deposited within one year at post-offices in the Canal Zone for the purchase of money orders to secure savings. Very recently Colonel Goethals, chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission, stated that he believed fully $1,250,000 worth of money orders had been bought in the Canal Zone for savings purposes. It certainly would appear good policy to place this money where it would serve a useful purpose.

The Canal Record, published at Ancon, in its issue of December 18, 1907, prints the following:

"MONEY DEPOSITS IN POST-OFFICES.

"A statement prepared by the director of posts shows that there was on deposit in the post-offices of the Canal Zone on November 30, 1907, a total of $200,994.19. This amount was paid in for money orders which the purchasers had made payable to themselves. The distribution of this money among the post-offices is shown by the following table:

Gorgona	$39,180.35
Empire	36,051.63
Culebra	35,761.50
Pedro Miguel	18,781.80
Paraiso	15,249.75
Las Cascadas	13,852.50
Bas Obispo	9,967.50
La Boca	7,898.50
Ancon	7,039.66
Cristobal	6,613.00
Tabernilla	5,005.00
Gatun	4,160.00
Corozal	1,093.00
Matachin	340.00
Total	200,994.19

"In other words, these figures show that a large number of the employees of the canal are using the post-offices of the zone as banks of deposit for their savings."

In a letter dated December 27, 1909, the secretary of the Isthmian Canal Commission, referring to the foregoing article, says:

"This amount has increased since that date, and the average now is from $375,000 to $380,000 each month. The depositors draw out some when they go on their vacation, but the average amount is about as stated. The distribution over the zone is given in the article marked."

Appendix F consists of interesting extracts from letters of postmasters throughout the United States on this subject.

FAVORED BY POSTMASTERS-GENERAL.

Postmasters-General for many years past have recommended the establishment of postal savings banks. Postmaster-General Creswell did so in 1871, 1872, and 1873; Postmaster-General Maynard, in 1880; Postmaster-General James, in 1881; Postmaster-General Howe, in 1882; Postmaster-General Gary, in 1887 and 1888; and Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in 1889 and 1890. Postmaster-General Meyer, in 1907 and 1908, actively encouraged the cause. Postmaster-General Hitchcock, in his annual report, presents a most cogent argument in the following terms:

"POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

"The establishment of postal savings banks is earnestly recommended. It is believed that they would prove here, as they have elsewhere, an inestimable benefit not only to those who directly use them, but also to the general business community, including the banking interests. At intervals for nearly forty years Postmasters-General have held and urged similar views. The proposition has steadily grown in public favor until now both our great political parties are on record in their platforms as favoring this form of government depositories for the current savings of persons of small means.

"The apparently conclusive reasons in behalf of such a system are already well understood, but brief reference to certain leading facts may serve a timely purpose.

"All agree that whatever induces in the mass of the people habits of saving makes for the public good. The betterment resulting from such a cause is not limited to pecuniary advantage, but includes improved standards of living, character, and morals. Nothing so greatly encourages economy and thrift as convenient opportunity for the safe custody and investment of small amounts of money. Nothing so promotes the opposite practice of wasteful expenditure and general unthrift as the absence of trustworthy depositories for savings. We are conspicuously lacking in facilities of this nature accessible to all our citizens.

"Our private savings banks neither are nor can be sufficiently numerous and accessible to meet this growing need. They render a valuable service, but their field is sharply limited. As they are necessarily restricted in location to communities having a reasonably dense population, they can not serve the requirements of that great proportion of our people who are widely distributed over the continent and remote from business centers.

"According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency there were in the United States, in 1909, 1,703 savings banks, or approximately one to every 52,000 of our population. The comptroller's statistics show that more than 81 per cent of the deposits in the savings banks of the country are in New England and the Eastern States, and that over 74 per cent of the savings deposits in our banks of all kinds are confined to the same limited territory. The remainder of the Union, embracing the vast area that includes the Southern, Middle Western, Western, and Pacific States, is comparatively destitute of savings banks, and the population of these regions is so widely scattered as to preclude any remedy for this condition except a postal savings system.

"Another important factor in the problem is the well-known and often unreasoning fear of financial loss that controls so large a part of the people in every community. The occasional failure of a bank is sufficient to transform this natural caution into a kind of distrust that restrains such people from depositing at any time in a bank, no matter how conveniently situated or how well conducted. The result is the hoarding and hiding of money. Similarly the placing of funds in safe-deposit vaults has the effect of withdrawing them from circulation, thus aggravating an acute situation in times of financial stress.

"On the other hand, all classes have unshakable confidence in the Government and its guaranty. A system of postal savings banks representing the national credit would constitute a conservative and reassuring influence in the financial and business affairs of the country. When once in familiar operation, it would draw forth the bulk of our hidden resources and restore them to the channels of business. The magnitude of the amount thus to be made available is not easily estimated, but that it would be very large and prove an immense advantage, especially in times of monetary stringency, is beyond dispute.

"Evidence of the universal confidence in the Government's reliability is found in the constantly increasing practice by which individuals buy postal money orders payable to themselves, merely as a method of safely keeping their earnings, for which safety they are willing to pay the fees and lose the interest their money might otherwise earn. Americans living near our northern frontier have been known to deposit considerable sums in Canadian postal savings banks across the border. Frequently postmasters are urged by foreigners to accept their savings for safe-keeping. Nearly all our immigrants come from countries having postal savings banks, in which they have learned to place the fullest confidence, and when they find that here they can not have government protection for their savings many of them transmit the money to their native countries for deposit until needed. In fact, several European nations advertise their postal banks in American publications and use much effort, through private bankers and otherwise, to attract deposits of American money.

"In the four years from 1906 to 1909, inclusive, United States postal money orders payable in foreign countries were issued to the vast sum of $312,775,148.81. About 80 per cent of this amount was transmitted to Austria, Great Britain, Hungary, Italy, Norway, and Russia, and without doubt consisted chiefly of the surplus earnings of our newly arrived immigrants and foreign-born laborers. Money orders, however, represent only a portion of the funds that are being constantly withdrawn from circulation and sent abroad. The increase in the outflow during the last few years has been surprisingly rapid. The full effect of such depletion is readily understood by business men, and particularly by bankers, knowing as they do how credit could be extended through regular banking channels with such a volume of money as a basis. That an American postal savings-bank system would go far to stop this outward tide of money and keep at home the earnings of our people, both native and foreign born, there can be do doubt.

The total amount of money in the United States is officially estimated to be about $3,000,000,000. Of this sum, nearly 65 per cent, or $2,000,000,000, is in the pockets of the people or in various hiding places—an average of nearly $22 per capita of population. There is every reason to believe that a system of postal savings banks would to a great extent call out these private hoards and return them to circulation through the regular banks of the country. One dollar per capita thus released from hiding places would add approximately $90,000,000 to the volume of the circulation. Five dollars per capita would amount to $450,000,000. Whatever this practical increase of the circulation proves to be, add to it the many millions that postal savings banks would prevent from being sent abroad by foreign-born depositors, and the total will reach a magnitude that may well command attention. The aggregate of deposits in the postal savings banks of Great Britain is some indication of the much larger volume to be expected for a similar system in the United States.

"Postal savings banks are not an experiment. Their success, stability, popularity, and great usefulness in the countries that have established them are a matter of public knowledge. No backward step has been taken. Beginning with England, in 1861, the great majority of the civilized nations of the world have adopted the postal bank system. Among the countries now maintaining such depositories are Austria, Belgium, Egypt, France, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Russia, Spain, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and the British colonies of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India. In Germany a system of municipal banks of long standing serves practically the same purpose.

"The postal savings banks in operation in the Philippine Islands are giving satisfaction. The amount of deposits in 1907 exceeded a quarter of a million dollars, representing 2,676 accounts, with average deposits of $111.

"A postal savings law should be so drawn as to make post-offices the feeders of regular banking institutions through the immediate redeposit of funds of postal depositories in the local banks. Thus the money would become promptly available for use in the business activities of the region where originally deposited.

"We have more than 60,000 post-offices, located at all centers of population, large and small, in the United States and the Territories. Many thousands of them are over a day's journey from a bank of any kind. In the large cities branch offices accommodate all sections. Through the establishment of postal savings banks, with their long hours, the opportunity to make deposits with a minimum of effort and without loss of time would be everywhere present. As is the case in other countries, the various members of the family, old and young, in town or country, would soon learn to transact business with the postal banks as easily as they now deal at the neighboring stores and shops. A recent report on the Austrian postal savings banks states that 44 per cent of the depositors are children and students. Artisans and laborers constitute 14.3 per cent. In all countries maintaining postal savings banks women, married and single, are among the most numerous and interested patrons. The value to any community of affording its people, and especially its youth, the opportunity and constant invitation to accumulate savings, and thus cultivate habits of thrift, can not be overestimated.

"Postal savings banks would be an efficient agency in improving the conditions of farm life throughout the United States, powerfully supplementing what has been already accomplished in this direction by the introduction of rural mail delivery, the telephone, and the trolley car. Their use would tend to encourage still further the rural classes to become patrons of commercial banks for general business purposes.

"One element of value not measurable in dollars and cents is the resulting stimulus to loyalty and patriotism among those who deposit in postal banks, because of the fact that they associate their own financial safety and welfare with the stability and honor of their Government.

"Postal depositories would benefit rather than injure our regular banking interests. No instance is of record where such a result has not ensued from the establishment of these depositories in foreign countries. For many years the introduction of postal savings banks in the United Kingdom was resisted on the ground that the proposed innovation would destroy, or greatly injure, the existing chartered savings banks. The system has been in operation there nearly half a century, and the predicted harm has not been realized. On the contrary, the chartered banks have enjoyed greater prosperity, both actually and relatively, than ever before. Their deposits have increased side by side with those of postal banks, and even more rapidly. The record in other countries is much the same. Thus there is little reason growing out of experience for the fear that postal savings banks would enter into hurtful competition with the regular banks. The limitation placed on the net amount to be deposited by any individual and the provision for redepositing in regular banks, together with the natural restriction of postal deposits by reason of the low rate of interest paid, would render the relation of the postal depositories to the regular banks one of helpful cooperation.

"In a word, while providing our people of small means with the best possible incentive and opportunity for thrift it would also be the function of an American postal savings-bank system to benefit the larger business and financial interests of the country by gathering, conserving, and restoring to circulation the vast sum of money that is now beyond the reach of the regular banks and which, in the absence of postal banks, would continue to be for the most part hoarded or sent abroad.

"The advantages referred to would closely follow the establishment of postal savings banks at any time, but the present juncture is especially opportune. The country has entered on a period of substantial prosperity. Money is required for legitimate development as almost never before. There appears to be no good reason why it should not be largely supplied from sources so easily reached but hitherto neglected.

"Under a statute and regulations properly drawn and enforced a postal savings-bank system in this country would be self-supporting. A fractional margin between the rate of interest paid to the depositors and the rate realized by the Government on redeposits would easily cover the cost of conducting the business. Only a moderate original outlay would be required for special equipment. Improvements in the postal service now being made should place the department in such condition that the additional work and responsibility incident to the operation of the postal savings banks could be readily assumed."

INDORSED BY THE PRESIDENT.

The President expresses himself very favorably and intimates that early action would be acceptable. The following is extracted from his annual message to Congress:

"POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

"The second subject worthy of mention in the Post-Office Department is the real necessity and entire practicability of establishing postal savings banks. The successful party at the last election declared in favor of postal savings banks, and although the proposition finds opponents in many parts of the country, I am convinced that the people desire such banks, and am sure that when the banks are furnished they will be productive of the utmost good. The postal savings banks are not constituted for the purpose of creating competition with other banks. The rate of interest upon deposits to which they would be limited would be so small as to prevent their drawing deposits away from other banks.

"I believe them to be necessary in order to offer a proper inducement to thrift and saving to a great many people of small means who do not now have banking facilities, and to whom such a system would offer an opportunity for the acumulation of capital. They will furnish a satisfactory substitute, based on sound principle and actual successful trial in nearly all the countries of the world, for the system of government guaranty of deposits now being adopted in several western States, which, with deference to those who advocate it, seems to me to have in it the seeds of demoralization to conservative banking and certain financial disaster.

"The question of how the money deposited in postal savings banks shall be invested is not free from difficulty, but I believe that a satisfactory provision for this purpose was inserted as an amendment to the bill considered by the Senate at its last session. It has been proposed to delay the consideration of legislation establishing a postal savings bank until after the report of the Monetary Commission. This report is likely to be delayed, and properly so, because of the necessity for careful deliberation and close investigation. I do not see why the one should be tied up with the other. It is understood that the Monetary Commission have looked into the systems of banking which now prevail abroad, and have found that by a control there exercised in respect to reserves and the rates of exchange by some central authority panics are avoided. It is not apparent that a system of postal savings banks would in any way interfere with a change to such a system here. Certainly in most of the countries in Europe where control is thus exercised by a central authority, postal savings banks exist and are not thought to be inconsistent with a proper financial and banking system."

CONCLUSION.

The effect of postal savings depositories upon established banks has been touched upon in this report at some length and in considerable detail. But separately and apart from the incidental effect on the profits of any particular business, it must always be borne in mind that the dominant idea in connection with the postal savings depository is to encourage thrift and a saving disposition among the people. When account is taken of the fact that between 40 and 50 per cent of the depositors in this class of institutions is made up of children and students, no one can fail to perceive that the habit of saving thus inculcated in the minds of the youth of the country will be of far-reaching and permanent benefit to the rising generation. The child trained to save will grow up with the habit of saving more firmly fixed as the years go by. The shiftless and the thriftless are a burden on society, and any public policy calculated to forestall an increase in the number of such thoughtless people can not but prove beneficial to the whole country.

The national and state governments maintain expensive educational systems for the purpose of instructing and enlightening the minds of our future citizens, and no one can be heard to complain that expenditures made in this direction are not wisely made from every point of view. What more valuable education can be given to young people than that which teaches them to live within their means, to pursue rational economy, and to save some portion of their means for future use and to meet contingencies.

The system proposed is not an innovation. It has received a world-wide trial, extending over half a century. There are those who say that the test in the United Kingdom should not be accepted as warranting the application of a similar system to this country because of its greater territorial area. To that argument it is sufficient to point to Russia, with a larger territorial area than our own and a population certainly less homogeneous and less capable of understanding and complying with the requirements of a postal savings system. Or we might refer with equal propriety to Canada. There is no virtue in the claim that our large territorial extent prohibits Congress from extending to the people the benefits of a system which has everywhere and under all circumstances and conditions proven beneficial to the masses.

Owing to the opposition of a considerable proportion of the banking fraternity to this measure the committee has felt moved to give unusual attention in this report to the effect of the savings-bank system upon commercial banking enterprises. It is asserted in the light of experience that the banking power of a country is increased and strengthened, rather than diminished or impaired, by the postal savings system. Such has been the experience everywhere, and why should it not be so here?

But the passage of the bill is not urged because it is deemed wise to force the system upon reluctant bankers. The passage of the bill is recommended by the committee because it is believed that if enacted into law it will prove of constant and enduring benefit to the American people.

[S. 5876, Sixty-first Congress, second session, as amended. In the Senate of the United States. January 27, 1910.—Mr. Carter introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.]

A bill to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, established a system of postal savings depositories under the supervision and direction of a board of trustees, which board shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, acting ex officio. All regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed by said board of trustees, and any general regulation prescribed by the Postmaster-General under authority of this act shall be subject to the approval of said board. Said board shall report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session their transactions under the provisions of this act, including a statement showing the number of post-offices receiving deposits of postal savings in each State and Territory, the aggregate amount of deposits made therein, the aggregate of withdrawals therefrom, the amount of interest paid to depositors, and the amount of extra expense incident to the system of postal savings, and all other facts and recommendations which they may deem pertinent and proper to present.

SEC. 2. That every post-office within the United States which is authorized to issue money orders, and such others as the Postmaster-General in his discretion may from time to time designate, are hereby declared to be postal savings depository offices to receive deposits from the public and to account for and dispose of the same according to this act. Every postal savings depository office shall be kept open for the transaction of business every day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) during the usual post-office business hours of the town or locality where such depository is located, and between such additional specific hours as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, if he deems it necessary or more practical, establish at first postal savings depositories only at the money-order offices of the first, second, and third classes, and thereafter extend the system as rapidly as practicable to all other post-offices specified above.

SEC. 3. That accounts may be opened and deposits made in any postal savings depository established under this act by any person of the age of 10 years or over, in his or her own name, and by a married women in her own name and free from any control or interference by her husband; but no person shall simultaneously have more than one postal savings account.

SEC. 4. That the postmaster at a postal savings depository shall, upon the making of an application to open an account under this act and the submission of an initial deposit, deliver to the depositor a pass book upon which shall be written the name and signature or mark of the depositor and such other memoranda as may be necessary for purposes of identification, in which pass book entries of all deposits shall be made: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, with the approval of the board of trustees, adopt some other device in lieu of a pass book as a means of making and preserving evidence of deposits.

SEC. 5. That at least $1, or a larger amount in multiples thereof, must be deposited before an account is opened with the person depositing the same, and $1, or multiples thereof, may be deposited after such account has been opened, but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in ane one calendar month: Provided, That in order that smaller amounts may be accumulated for deposit any person may purchase from any depository office for 10 cents a postal savings card to which may be attached specially prepared adhesive stamps, to be known as "postal savings stamps," and when the stamps so attached amount to $1, or a larger sum in multiples thereof, including the 10-cent postal savings card, the same may be presented as a deposit for opening an account, and additions may be made to any account by means of such card and stamps in amounts of $1, or multiples thereof, and when a card and stamps thereto attached are redeemed by any postmaster he shall immediately cancel the same. It is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster-General to prepare such postal savings cards and postal savings stamps of denominations of 10 cents, and to keep them on sale at every postal savings depository office, and to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the issue, sale, and cancellation thereof.

SEC. 6. That interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum shall be allowed and entered to the credit of each depositor once in each year, the same to be computed on such basis and under such rules and regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe; but interest shall not be computed or allowed on any amount less than $1, or some multiple thereof: Provided, That the balance to the credit of any one person shall never be allowed to exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest.

SEC. 7. That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe. No bank in which postal savings funds shall be deposited shall receive any exchange or other fees or compensation on account of the cashing of collection of any checks or the performance of any other service in connection with the postal savings depository system.

SEC. 8. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory, and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum. Where more than one such bank is available, the deposits shall be distributed ratably among the banks as far as practicable on the basis of their capital and surplus. The board of trustees shall take from such bank or banks such indemnity bonds as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt repayment of such deposits on demand. At its option any bank may deposit collateral security in lieu of an indemnity bond, such collateral to be subject to the approval of said board. If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, or in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits were received: Provided, That postal savings funds deposited in any State or Territory in which no provision is made by law governing the investment of savings-bank funds may be invested in the same character of securities in such State or Territory as are made the subject of investment of savings-bank funds by the laws of the States of New York or California: Provided further, That said board of trustees shall maintain a reserve fund, either with the Treasurer of the United States or the banks as herein provided, not more in amount than 10 per cent of the total funds deposited in postal savings depositories. Interest and profits accruing from the deposit or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of expenses of administration authorized by the board of trustees and approved by the Postmaster-General and of interest due to postal savings depositors as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury as part of the postal revenues: Provided, That in the Treasury or with the Treasurer of the United States postal savings funds shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act and not otherwise. For the purposes of this act the word "Territory," as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

SEC. 9. That postal savings depository funds shall be kept separate from other funds by postmasters and other officers and employees of the Postal Service, who shall be held to the same accountability under their bonds for such funds as for public moneys; and no person connected with the Post-Office Department shall disclose to any person other than the depositor the amount of any deposit, unless directed so to do by the Postmaster-General. All statutes relating to the safekeeping of and proper accounting for public moneys are made applicable to such funds, and the Postmaster-General may require postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at postal savings depositories to give any additional bond he may deem necessary.

SEC. 10. That additional compensation shall be allowed postmasters at post-offices of the fourth class for the transaction of postal savings depository business. Such compensation shall be at not to exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent on the average sum upon which interest is paid each calendar year on receipts at such post-office, and shall be paid from the postal revenues; but postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at post-offices of the presidential grade shall not receive any additional compensation for such service.

SEC. 11. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Postmaster-General and the board of trustees to establish a system of postal savings depositories in accordance with the provisions of this act; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to require postmasters and other postal officers and employees to transact, in connection with their other duties, such postal-savings depository business as may be necessary; and he is also authorized to make, and with the approval of the board of trustees to promulgate, and from time to time to modify or revoke, such rules and regulations not in conflict with law as he may deem necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 12. That postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be entitled to all the safeguards provided by law for the protection of public moneys and all statutes relating to the embezzlement, conversion, improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of postal and money-order funds, and the punishments provided for such offenses are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings depository funds, and all statutes relating to false returns of postal and money-order business, the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, improper use, or handling of postal and money-order blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor, with the penalties provided in such statutes, are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings depository business, and the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, improper use, or handling of postal savings depository blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect on the first day of the third calendar month after its approval.

The effort has been made to procure all the data possible and to collate statistics from every available source, so that the best and latest information, both as to the history of the postal savings movement here and the experience of other countries, may be available in concise form for ready reference. The tables to be found in the appendix constitute a convincing exposition of the all-around excellence of the idea and its prompt and enduring success wherever it has been enacted into law.

APPENDIX A.

Information relating to the postal savings bank of the United Kingdom.

The post-office acts as a bank for savings throughout the United Kingdom.

In every town and in almost every village small savings may be paid in at the post-office. The money will be held in safety by the Government, will earn interest, and, when required, may be drawn out through the local post-office wherever the owner may be.

Any person over the age of 7 may become a depositor in the savings bank, and special arrangements are made for the encouragement of thrift among children and others who are only able to save a few pence at a time.

Special facilities are also afforded to depositors in the post-office savings bank for making investments in government stock, for purchasing annuities, and for effecting life insurances.

GENERAL RULES.

BY WHOM ACCOUNTS MAY BE OPENED.

Accounts may be opened by any man or woman of full age and by any child over 7 years old.

Accounts may also be opened—

"a. On behalf and in the names of children under 7 years old. (Money so deposited is not withdrawable until the children attain the age of 7 years, and is then payable to their signatures only.)

"b. By two or more persons jointly on their own behalf, provided no one of them has any other account in a savings bank (see p. 120).

"c. By one or more persons in trust for another person or persons also named in the account (see p. 120). A person may act as trustee in any number of accounts, and at the same time have an account in his own name.

"d. On behalf of insane persons by the committees of their estates.

"e. By a duly registered friendly society upon the application of all the trustees of such society.

"f. By a duly registered industrial and provident society, not chargeable with income tax (see Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, secs. 39 and 24).

"g. By a charitable or provident society, penny bank, or similar institution, through the trustees or treasurer.

"h. By corporate bodies (subject to the approval of the postmaster-general).

"i. By vicars and rectors of parishes in England and Wales, and by other official persons, being corporations sole (subject to the approval of the postmaster-general), the accounts being opened in their official titles.

"j. In the name of the registrar of a county court."

When it is desired to deposit under d, e, f, g, h, or i, application must first be made for authority to the comptroller of the savings bank. A copy of the rules of the society or information as to the constitution of the body corporate should accompany the application, except in cases under paragraphs d and i.

OPENING AN ACCOUNT.

On opening an account, a person must state his full name, occupation, and residence. He must also sign a declaration to the effect that he takes no benefit from any other account in the post-office savings bank or in a trustee savings bank (unless it be in respect of deposits to which he is entitled from the account of a deceased depositor, but which, by reason of his age, he can not withdraw, or as a member of a society entitled to deposit in a savings bank, or in respect of deposits made in the name of the registrar of a county court pursuant to statute). This declaration must be witnessed by the officer receiving the deposit or by some person known to him or by some other officer of the post-office or by a minister of any religious denomination, a justice of the peace, or a commissioner to administer oaths. If the declaration is not true, all sums illegally deposited will be liable to forfeiture. It is not necessary that a person desiring to become a depositor should attend at a post-office for the purpose of opening an account, as the declaration, when duly signed, can be presented at the office on his behalf by another person, together with the money to be deposited.

Every person opening an account should see that he obtains a bank book.

DEPOSITS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

All deposits standing in the sole name of a married woman domiciled in England or Ireland are deemed, unless and until the contrary is shown, to be her separate property; and the fact that any deposit is standing in the sole name of a married woman is prima facie evidence that she is entitled to withdraw and receive the same without the concurrence of her husband.

Payment of deposits by a married woman domiciled in Scotland is subject to the provisions of the married women's property (Scotland) act, 1881. The deposits of married women domiciled in the Channel Islands or in the Isle of Man are repayable consistently with the laws in force in those islands, respectively.

Any woman who marries while she is a depositor should forward to the controller of the savings bank a certificate of her marriage, together with her deposit book, and the deposits will thereupon be entered in her married name. Upon application to the controller she will be supplied with a form by means of which she can obtain a marriage certificate for the sole purpose of her account at the reduced fee of 1 shilling.

HOW MUCH MAY BE DEPOSITED.

Any sum from 1 shilling upward, but excluding pence, is accepted as an ordinary deposit, subject to the limits of £50 a year (ending December 31), and £200 in all (including interest and stock dividends, if any). These limits are, however, subject to the following modifications:

"a. Stock dividends are not reckoned during the year in which they are credited to a depositor's account.

"b. A depositor, besides depositing £50 in any year ending December 31, may deposit in the same year one sum or several sums for the purpose of replacing in whole or in part any one (but not more than one) withdrawal previously made in that year.

"c. Deposits made in any year ending December 31, and applied to the purchase of stock, or to annuity or life-insurance purposes during the same year, are not regarded as ordinary deposits; and further deposits within the prescribed limits may be made to replace them.

"d. Money transferred from the account of a deceased depositor is not regarded as an ordinary deposit."

When a depositor has £200 to the credit of his deposit account he can not make any further ordinary deposit. But if he reduces his balance by a withdrawal, a transfer to another depositor's account, or a stock investment, or by applying part of the money to annuity or insurance purposes, he can make further ordinary deposits, subject to the annual limit of £50, until the total limit of £200 is again reached.

Information as to deposits for immediate investment in government stock will be found at page 124; and as to deposits for annuity and insurance purposes at page 129.

The limits of ordinary deposits may be exceeded in the following cases:

"1. Registered friendly societies, or registered industrial and provident societies not chargeable with income tax, are allowed to make deposits without limit.

"2. Charitable or provident societies, penny banks, or similar institutions, can deposit to the extent of £100 in any one year ending December 31, and £300 in all, exclusive of interest. If the consent of the national-debt commissioners be obtained deposits may be made without limit.

"3. Incorporated building societies can make deposits, provided the whole amount, exclusive of government stock, credited to the society at any one time does not exceed £300.

"4. Deposits may also be made in accordance with the provisions of the several acts of Parliament applicable to the respective cases: (a) Under the workmen's compensation acts; (b) in the case of trust moneys and equitable proceedings through a county court; and (c) in any other proceedings in which the money was paid into a county court and ordered by the judge to be invested for the benefit of any infant or person of unsound mind. All these accounts may include odd pence."

SMALL SAVINGS.

Forms to which stamps may be affixed are supplied at all post-offices for the assistance of children and others unable to save more than a penny or two at a time. Any such person desirous of saving 1 shilling by means of penny contributions, for deposit in the post-office savings bank, may do so by purchasing with every penny saved a penny stamp and affixing it to one of these forms. Stamps perforated with initials or marks can not be accepted. Full instructions are printed on the form.

Special facilities are provided for assisting managers of penny banks and for the saving of pence by children attending elementary schools. Information on the subject will be furnished on application to the controller of the savings bank.

CHECKS AS DEPOSITS.

A check or postal order is accepted for deposit, provided it is not crossed to a particular bank. A money order (with a similar limitation as to crossing) is also accepted, but only at the office on which it is drawn, and subject to the usual conditions for cashing money orders. Checks bearing the words "not negotiable" are only accepted when drawn in favor of the depositor. Irish checks are only accepted in Ireland and Scotch checks in Scotland.

RECEIPTS FOR DEPOSITS.

Every deposit must be entered in the depositor's book by the postmaster or other person receiving it, who must affix to the entry his signature (or his initials) and the stamp of his office. A depositor should carefully examine his book before leaving the office to ascertain that the entry is correct, and he should keep his book in his own possession.

In addition to the receipt in the book, the depositor receives, for every deposit of £1 or over, an acknowledgment by post from the Central Savings Bank in London, and this should reach him within four clear days, exclusive of Sundays and bank holidays, if the deposit be made in England or Wales, or within six days if it be made in Ireland or Scotland, except that where a deposit is made by check the acknowledgment is not dispatched until a period of twelve days has elapsed, including the date of the deposit. The depositor should see that the acknowledgment is quite free from erasure, and states the exact amount of the deposit and the day on which the deposit was made. If the acknowledgment does not reach the depositor in proper time, or if when it reaches him it shows any signs of erasure or does not agree with the entry in his book, the depositor should immediately apply to the controller of the savings bank by letter, and should renew his application again and again until he obtains a satisfactory reply.

It is not necessary that an acknowledgment should be addressed to a depositor's place of residence, as it can be sent to a post-office to be called for, or to any other address that may be furnished for the purpose at the time the deposit is made.

No acknowledgment is sent for any deposit under £1, the entry of such a deposit in the depositor's book being conclusive evidence of the sum deposited.

A depositor may make or withdraw deposits at any post-office transacting savings-bank business without change of deposit book.

INTEREST ON DEPOSITS.

Interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent per annum for each complete pound (which is at the rate of 6 pence a year, or 1 half-penny a calendar month) is allowed on ordinary deposits, and also on any interest or dividends already credited to a depositor's account. The interest is calculated from the first day of the calendar month next following the day on which a pound has been deposited or completed up to the last day of the calendar month preceding that in which a warrant for repayment is issued, and after each 31st of December it is added to the principal (so long as the account remains open); but when, by the addition of interests or dividends, or by transfer from the account of a deceased person, the sum due in a deposit account is raised above £200, interest is allowed on £200 only. This restriction as to interest has reference only to those accounts to which the limit of £200 is applicable.

Once in each year, on the anniversary of the day on which his first deposit was made, the depositor should forward his book to the controller of the savings bank, in order that it may be compared with the ledgers, and that the interest to the previous 31st December may be inserted.

An envelope for the transmission of the book can be obtained at any post-office transacting savings-bank business when the proper time for forwarding the book has arrived.

HOW TO WITHDRAW MONEY—ORDINARY WITHDRAWALS.

When a depositor wishes to withdraw money from his account, he should fill up and forward to the central savings bank a notice of withdrawal, which he can obtain at any post-office transacting savings-bank business. He will then receive a warrant which he should present, together with his book, at the post-office where payment is to be made, and the postmaster will take from him a receipt on the warrant. The receipt should be signed in the presence of the postmaster (or other paying officer).

When an application for the withdrawal of money is made by more persons than one, they may request that the sum to be withdrawn may be paid to any one or more of them to the exclusion of the others, and in such case the warrant will be made out in the name or names of the person or persons specified in such request, and his or their receipt will be deemed to be the receipt of all the applicants.

Payment of a warrant is made only to the person named in it, or upon the production of an authority from that person, which may be given either as directed on the prescribed form of order obtainable at any post-office transacting savings-bank business, or by power of attorney under seal.

If the person to whom the warrant is made payable can not write, he must, when he presents the warrant for payment, affix his mark to the receipt at the foot of the warrant in the presence of some person known to the paying officer, who can identify the person applying for the money as the person named in the warrant. This person must also attest the mark by his written signature.

WITHDRAWAL ON DEMAND OF SUMS NOT EXCEEDING £1.

Any sum not exceeding £1 can be withdrawn without notice at any post-office transacting savings-bank business. A form of application will be handed to the depositor to fill in, and his receipt for the money will be taken on the same form. The book will be retained by the postmaster for transmission to the central savings bank, but will be returned to the depositor in the course of a few days.

Payments without notice are only made to depositors in person.

If a depositor can not write, he must, unless personally known at the post-office, be accompanied by some person known there who can vouch for his identity and attest his mark.

WITHDRAWALS BY TELEGRAPH AND BY RETURN OF POST.

A depositor may obtain payment from his account of any sum not exceeding £10 on the same day on which notice is given by defraying the cost of the necessary telegrams to and from the controller, savings bank, London.

While every effort is made at the chief office to expedite the dispatch of telegrams of advice, it is pointed out that payment by telegraph is defined by the regulations, framed under act of Parliament, as payment on the day on which a depositor gives notice of withdrawal, and not within a certain limit of time on that day.

A depositor may also, at a less cost for telegraphing, obtain payment from his account on the day after giving notice (i. e., "return of post") of any sum not exceeding £20. The "return of post" warrant is addressed to the depositor at the paying office "to be called for" unless other directions are given in the telegram of withdrawal.

Applications for withdrawal by telegraph should be made between the hours of 9 a. m. and 4 p. m. (Saturdays 9 a. m. and 1 p. m.) at any post-office transacting savings-bank business which is also a telegraph office, but payment on the same day can not be made at offices where telegraph business is restricted to the dispatch of telegrams.

The depositor's book must be produced in all cases.

PAYMENT OF MONEY ON DEATH—NOMINATION—ADDITION OF NAME—TRANSFER.

Special facilities are afforded for the repayment of small sums (not exceeding £100) on death. Many legal formalities are dispensed with, and depositors of the age of 16 and upward can, by a simple printed form, nominate a relation or friend to receive their deposits.

Additional persons can be made joint proprietors of the moneys on account; and deposits can be transferred from one account to another.

Full information on all these matters can be obtained from the controller of the savings bank. In the case of a claim on death, a form of application should be obtained at a post-office.

TRANSFER TO AND FROM TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS.

A person may transfer his deposit from a trustee savings bank to the post-office savings bank, or vice versa, by obtaining a certificate of transfer, which will be accepted as a deposit of the amount therein set forth. Forms of application for certificates of transfer to a trustee savings bank can be obtained at any post-office transacting savings-bank business.

DEPOSIT BOOK.

If any depositor loses his book, he should immediately give notice to the controller and state the circumstances in which the book has been lost. The controller should also be informed of what post-office and in what year the account was opened, and what amount is believed to be due therein; the number of the book should also be stated, if possible. If the depositor desires a new book, he must inclose postage stamps, or a postal order, of the value of 1 shilling, to pay for the new book.

No charge is made for the books at first supplied to depositors, or for further books supplied when those in use are filled.

A deposit book is not a security for money lent, and no claim by any person holding a deposit book in respect of a loan can be recognized. Deposits in the post-office savings bank are not liable to "attachment," or to its Scotch equivalent, "arrestment."

FREE POSTAGE.

A depositor residing within the United Kingdom need not pay any postage when communicating with the controller on savings-bank business or when transmitting his book for examination.

SECRECY.

The officers of the postmaster-general engaged in the receipt or payment of deposits are not allowed to disclose the name of any depositor or any particulars of his account, except to the postmaster-general, or to such of his officers as may be appointed to assist in carrying out the provisions of the post-office savings-bank acts.

As already stated, depositors may arrange to have their acknowledgments directed to a post-office to avoid calling attention to their accounts.

ARBITRATION AS TO DISPUTES.

All questions between the postmaster-general and any depositor or between rival claimants to deposits are determined by the registrar of friendly societies after hearing all parties, and no legal expense need be incurred.

FURTHER INFORMATION.

Detailed information with regard to any other point connected with savings-bank business may be obtained by writing to the controller of savings bank.

PERSONAL INQUIRIES.

An office for personal inquiries is open at the Central Savings Bank (Blythe road, West Kensington, London, W.), from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m.; Saturdays, 9 a. m. to 1 p. m.

APPENDIX B.

The postal savings banks of France.

The French postal savings system can not be described adequately without also going into detail as to the "ordinary" savings bank. The various kinds of savings banks are officially designated as ordinary savings banks, postal savings banks, auxiliary postal savings banks, school savings banks, naval savings banks, and prison savings banks. The postal savings bank has its headquarters at Paris, and is under the minister of posts and telegraphs. The minimum deposit accepted is 1 franc (about 20 cents). The maximum deposit for individuals is 1,500 francs ($289.50), and for institutions 15,000 francs ($2,895). When a depositor's account reaches the sum of 50 francs or exceeds that sum he may, if he so desires, have a government bond purchased for him without charge, worth 50 francs or some multiple of that sum. Although the minimum deposit accepted is 1 franc, smaller sums may be saved by means of stamps of low denominations, which are attached to a card and presented for deposit when their total value reaches 1 franc.

INTEREST.

The rate of interest for the ordinary savings banks is fixed by the caisse des depots (central bureau at Paris, referred to later), and is calculated on the income of the securities deposited with the treasury, which represent the deposits made in the savings banks. The postal savings banks have paid 2½ per cent interest in recent years. Changes in the rate must be by fractions of one-fourth of 1 per cent. The interest paid by the postal savings banks must always be at least three-fourths of 1 per cent less than that paid by the ordinary savings banks. Changes in the interest rate are made upon the recommendation of the minister of commerce and the minister of finance, after the matter shall have received the approval of the audit commission of the caisse des depots and of the commission described in the following paragraph.

SAVINGS BANK COMMISSION.

The organization of a commission under the auspices of the minister of commerce is provided for, which must meet at least once a year and express its opinions on all questions relating to both ordinary and postal savings banks.

This commission is composed of 20 members, as follows:

"Two senators, elected by the Senate.

"Two deputies, elected by the Chamber of Deputies.

"Eight presidents or directors of savings banks, elected by the savings banks according to certain regulations.

"Three persons well known by their writings on benevolent subjects, to be appointed by the minister of commerce.

"The director-general of the National Central Bank.

"The director-general of the caisse des depots.

"The director of internal commerce in the ministry of commerce.

"The director of money circulation in the ministry of finance.

"Chief of the inspection service of finance."

Both the elected and the appointed members of this commission hold office for three years.

The director of internal commerce in the ministry of commerce has the office of secretary, and has the right of the floor in the national legislative body.

The president of the commission also has the right of the floor and may speak at the sessions of the supervising commission of the National Central Bank. He is called to all sessions of the national legislative body when questions involving postal savings banks are under discussion.

EXPENSES OF ADMINISTRATION.

The ordinary savings banks must deduct for rent, salaries of officials, and other necessary expenses of administration not less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the total deposits, and they may not deduct more than one-half of 1 per cent for this purpose. The postal savings banks must deduct not less than one-half of 1 per cent and the sum so retained must be sufficient so that the rate of interest will always be at least three-fourths of 1 per cent less than that paid by the ordinary savings banks.

INVESTMENT.

There is a bureau of deposit (see auditing and accounting) at Paris to which the deposits are sent. All deposits so received, except such part of them as may be deemed necessary for the payment of withdrawals, are invested in state bonds or bonds guaranteed by the State, in negotiable obligations of the departments, communes, and chambers of commerce, in real estate, or in the credit foncier. (The credit foncier is a sort of mutual stock company formed for the purpose of making investments in real estate, and it issues interest-bearing obligations. It is often stated in general that the moneys deposited in postal savings banks are invested in "rentes"—securities of any kind upon which interest is paid.)

The purchase and sale of bonds and negotiable obligations are made in public, open to competition, but the law permits the purchase and sale of obligations other than bonds without publicity or competition, should such a course be deemed advisable.

Unemployed sums must not exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the deposits on the 1st of January. These unemployed sums are deposited in an open account in the national treasury under the same conditions as the other elements of the floating debt bearing interest, or are deposited in the Bank of France. The part of these unemployed sums deposited upon open account in the treasury is not permitted to exceed the sum of 100,000,000 francs (about $20,000,000).

"FAVORED" DEPOSITORS.

Depositors whose accounts during the year have never exceeded 500 francs each may be allowed a higher rate of interest than that paid to other depositors. The accounts of benevolent associations, however, are always to be treated as belonging to the favored class of accounts, no matter what the amount of the account may be. Accounts may be favored in this manner only when the reserve fund amounts to at least 2 per cent of the total deposits in the bank concerned. No postal savings bank may pay, even to "favored" depositors, interest in excess of that paid by the ordinary savings banks. And whenever a special rate is to be paid the regulation fixing the amount must be published at least three months before being applied. This information must also be communicated to the minster of finance, who may, within thirty days after receipt thereof, annul such special treatment. There is, however, an appeal from such an act of annulment through the minister and the counselor of state.

SPECIAL OR RESERVE FUND.

Each ordinary and postal savings bank must have a reserve fund, which shall be composed of—

1. The funds on hand properly pertaining to it.
2. All gifts and legacies which may be made to it.
3. All savings or unexpended residue of the amounts taken out for administrative expenses.
4. The interest and other income from these funds.

Postal savings banks are allowed to invest this fund in state bonds or bonds guaranteed by the State; in negotiable obligations of the departments, communes, and chambers of commerce; in real estate obligations; in obligations of the credit foncier; and in the purchase or construction of improved real estate necessary for the transaction of their business.

LOSSES.

All losses in the management of the postal savings bank are to be paid out of this reserve fund, which is called the "personal fortune" of the bank.

AUDITING.

Provision is made for an auditing force at Paris, the expense of which is borne by the postal savings banks, salaries, etc., being paid according to the orders of the ministers of finance and commerce, after the approval of the cabinet of ministers.

ACCOUNTING.

The sums paid into the post-offices are transferred to Paris, to a responsible officer of the postal savings bank nominated (appointed) by the President of the Republic. This officer is known as the agent comptable (auditor). He is appointed to and may be a judge in the court of accounts. He makes a daily balance based on the daily reports of the post-office banks. The result enables him to determine the amounts to be turned over to the national treasury, the Bank of France, or the Caisse de consignations.

The name "savings bank" may be employed only by banks organized under the law of July 20, 1895, which practically means that all savings banks are national in scope.

The ordinary savings banks are so closely restricted and their operations so carefully scrutinized by the Government that, except for the slight difference in interest and the fact that they are not as conveniently situated, they serve all the purposes of the postal savings banks as to safety.

ACCOUNTS OF MINORS.

Minors have the right to open an account without procuring the permission of their legal representatives. They can not make withdrawals if their parents or guardians object.

ONLY ONE ACCOUNT TO A PERSON.

Not more than one account shall be opened in the same name in savings banks, either ordinary or postal. The penalty for doing otherwise is loss of the total interest on the sums so deposited.

TELEGRAPHIC WITHDRAWALS.

Upon the demand of the depositors repayment of their funds may be made by telegraph or by postal money order, the depositor paying the expense.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The mail of the savings-bank business is carried free of postage.

DECEASED DEPOSITORS.

All transfers and the drawing of legal documents, including the preparation of any necessary papers in the case of deceased depositors, will be gratis. This same regulation is applicable to depositors who are legally declared "absent."

STATUTE OF LIMITATION.

Judgments against accounts expire by limitation in five years from the date of their issue, unless sooner renewed.

HISTORICAL AND GENERAL.

Since the 1st of August, 1884, all the post-offices of all grades in France, and all others outside of France, known as full post-offices, or offices of the first class, have been opened for postal-savings business. A decree of October 29, 1885, authorized the establishment of savings banks in cities situated in foreign countries wherever there is a branch of the French post-office, under the management of a postmaster and under the superintendence of a consul or vice-consul of France. The postal savings bank now has branches in Alexandria, Tangiers, and Port Said. Another decree, of March, 1885, established a naval branch in each of the divisions of the naval fleet, and deposits may be made on board of each of the national men-of-war.

On May 30, 1882, a convention between France and Belgium, approved June 12 of the same year, permits depositors in the French Postal Savings Bank or the Belgium General Postal Savings Bank and the Bank for Annuities of Belgium to transfer from one bank to the other sums of money up to and including 2,000 francs (about $400).

The auditor at Paris, whose duties and manner of appointment already have been referred to, is responsible not alone for his own acts, but for all the operations made on his account by the postmasters (receveurs des postes). He receives and is responsible for deposits. When a deficit is found in the accounts of one of the postmasters or any other official, the auditor immediately causes an action to be brought against him.

The criticism has been made that there might possibly be a run on the postal savings banks, and this has been replied to in this way: First, there is the possibility of applying the legal right, which is reserved, to demand a certain period of postponement in making repayments. Deposits are ordinarily paid practically on demand. The law allows the borrowing, on the assets of the bank, from the Bank of France, or any other financial institution. Again, in case of necessity, an official order of the proper minister gives authority to the postal savings bank to pay only the minimum sum of 50 francs on each account every two weeks. These are safeguarding provisions in the law, the necessity for applying which has never arisen. All these special privileges are extended to the ordinary as well as to the postal savings banks.

APPENDIX C.

[From l'Union Postale, March and April, 1908.]

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS OF THE AUSTRIAN POST-OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

On January 12, 1908, the Austrian Post-Office Savings Bank celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its existence. To commemorate the occasion a special pamphlet was issued describing the history, the growth, the importance, and the work of the post-office savings bank, from the varied contents of which we reproduce the following:

"The success which followed the organization of the post-office savings bank in England soon induced the Austrians to study the possibility of creating in their own country a state savings bank with the cooperation of the post-office and adapted to the needs of the general public. The economic condition of the country was, however, not favorable to the realization of such an idea, so that at the time no decision was arrived at. It was not till 1881 that the plan was again brought up for discussion. On May 28, 1882, a bill "relating to the organization of post-office savings banks in the kingdoms and dominions represented in the Parliament" received the sanction of the Emperor, and on January 12, 1883, the post-office savings bank was opened.

"As a state institution its duty was, under guaranty of the Government, to accept deposits at interest, to make repayments, to buy and sell government stocks for the depositors, and, on the demand of those concerned, to take charge of and administer the stocks purchased. Its organization was on the whole similar to that of the English post-office savings bank, and was based on the principle that all the post-offices should accept deposits and make repayments in the service of the post-office savings bank, and that in this respect they would be immediately under the control of the savings-bank department.

"The organization stood the test, and the post-office savings bank was a complete success from the first year of its existence. It was also the foundation on which, in November, 1883, the post-office savings-bank department was extended by the incorporation of the check and clearing system.

"The extent of the growth of the post-office savings-bank department in all its branches during the twenty-five years of its existence is presumably well known; the Union Postale contains in nearly every volume detailed accounts of its activity.

"The cooperation of the post-offices in the work of the savings bank is on the whole restricted to the issue of deposit books, the receipt of deposits, and the effecting of repayments. The post-office savings department in Vienna has, however, the superintendence of the whole service; the accounting and the bookkeeping; all applications for the withdrawal of sums from 40 crowns[a] and upward pass through its hands; it invests the capital of, and does all the necessary correspondence with, the depositors. The work of the department in Vienna is executed by 441 persons.

"The operations of the savings bank are not limited to the post-offices; rural letter carriers are authorized to receive on their rounds deposits up to 1,000 crowns on a single deposit book and to deliver them to the post-office.

"The operations of the department have also been extended by the organization of a savings-bank service on men-of-war. Savings-bank business is transacted on these ships when their absence in foreign waters is calculated to last more than three months. Up to the present time it has been organized on 14 ships; a similar collecting office also exists for the contingent of the Austrian embassy in Peking.

"Special arrangements have been made to collect the savings of school children. The savings-bank department gives to the school directors, on demand, blank forms, which, when filled, are handed to the post-office by the teachers with the amounts to be deposited, together with the deposit books.

"The model on which the savings-bank business is transacted is adapted to the needs of the population which the savings bank is called to serve. The leading principle is the freedom of the service, in this sense, that deposits and withdrawals can be effected at all post-offices, without regard to the place at which the deposit books were issued. Special precautions are taken to insure money being paid to none but those who have a right to receive it; withdrawals are only paid to the depositor himself or, on sufficient guaranty (examination of the signature, proofs of identity, etc.), to the person appointed by him to receive it. Savings-bank deposits can neither be distrained nor sequestrated, and no one has a right to demand a refusal of payment. To render the correspondence less onerous all letters passing between the depositors and the savings-bank department and the post-offices may be sent post free; all petitions presented by the depositors to the savings-bank department and all transfers of capital to third persons are free of stamp duty and free. All printed matter for the depositors (deposit books, withdrawal forms, etc.) are gratis.

"Deposits are received from 1 crown upward. In order to permit of smaller deposits being made, cards are issued with one embossed 10-heller stamp and room for affixing others. As soon as the value of the stamps reaches 1 crown, the card can be given in at a post-office as a deposit.

[a] The value of a crown in American money is $0.203.

"The maximum amount of a deposit is 2,000 crowns. The interest is fixed at 3 per cent. On the demand of a depositor his capital can be used to buy Austrian government stocks. These may remain in the custody of the savings-bank department, which then cashes the dividends and enters the amount in the deposit book.

"At the end of 1907 more than 2,000,000 persons of all classes of society had deposits in the savings bank, among them many of limited means, such as school children, artisans, work people, and domestic servants. These depositors have saved 219,000,000 crowns, not counting the sums which have been spent in the purchase of government stock, which, added to the rest, would make up a sum of 445,000,000 crowns.

"In order to cover any loss which the savings bank may incur, a reserve fund has been created from the profits of the bank and which has long reached the legal maximum of 4,000,000 crowns. The balance which arises in the savings bank flows to the post-office. In 1906 it amounted to 1,361,991 crowns.

"The incorporation of the check and clearing system in the post-office savings bank was effected on October 29, 1883, the whole of the post-offices being gradually brought into the system and authorized to receive deposits and make repayments for the account of owners of check accounts. The check service of the savings bank consists in the facility by which sums of money can be paid in to the account of owners of check accounts or transferred from one account to another by means of checks. In the latter case the amount is deducted from the one account and credited to the other without any money being used in the transaction (clearing). The capital thus formed is at the free disposal of its owner.

"Anyone can participate in the check service on depositing a fixed nucleus capital of 100 crowns. Interest of 2 per cent is given on the capital. In the check service a fee of 4 heller is charged for every transaction, and a commission of one-fourth per thousand for cash withdrawals up to 6,000 crowns and one-eighth per thousand for all that part of the withdrawal which exceeds that amount. The payment of interest on the one side and of fees on the other is effected by means of credit and debit entries in the accounts.

"The check system is used more and more every year. At the present time there are 79,711 participants, for whom in the past year 45,800,000 transactions for 21,584,000,000 crowns were made. The extent to which the check system is made use of by the various government administrations may be gathered from the fact that, in the year 1907 alone, 210,000,000 crowns were paid in for rates and taxes, and that in Lower Austria 22,000 pensions are paid every month through the medium of the savings bank.

"The object of the clearing system is to effect payments through the accounts in such a way as to reduce the employment of money—that is to say, of coin—to a minimum. A check drawn by the owner of a check account in favor of another person owning a check account is never paid in cash unless the latter refuses expressly to have the amount credited to his account.

"For the convenience of persons who make much use of the check system an arrangement has been made by which several amounts to be paid to different persons at the same time, by means of the clearing system, can be made with one check. In such cases the check must be accompanied by a list containing the names of the persons to whom payment is to be made, the amount each is to receive, etc.

"At the end of 1907 the number of participants in the clearing system was 78,546, or 98 per cent of all the owners of accounts. The number of transactions effected under this system was 6,866,562, with a turnover of 9,858,000,000 crowns.

"The principal condition for the extensive use of a check service is the possibility of withdrawing the invested money when necessary and of using it for cash payments. It was therefore a very good plan to make special arrangements which favor the transfer of money from the savings bank to the check branch. The forms by means of which this transfer is effected are on the one hand deposit forms and on the other orders of payment and checks payable to bearer.

"The deposit forms are used for depositing in the savings bank, through the post-offices, money which the owners of check accounts are to receive from persons who have no accounts in the bank. The reverse operation is effected by means of orders of payment, which are used principally in transactions with persons living at a distance, and of checks for local transactions. The deposit forms and orders of payment have the opposite effect to that of the clearing system, an extensive use of which will render the former more and more unnecessary. In 1907, 31,819,112 deposits for 5,743,000,000 crowns were nevertheless effected by means of deposit forms and 4,837,510 payments for 2,319,000,000 crowns made by means of orders of payment.

"The check transactions are the same as those of other check banks. The checks, which must be indorsed, are paid to the bearer on demand at the post-office savings bank in Vienna. Checks payable to order are not accepted in this service. Checks are used almost exclusively in Vienna itself by the owners of check accounts who wish to withdraw money for their own use or for payment to persons who have no account.

"Savings-bank checks are in great favor in Vienna, and in the last few years they have been made use of to an increasingly large extent. The highest number of checks ever presented in one day at the post-office savings bank was 4,630 for 13,388,214 crowns in 1906, and 5,323 for 18,180,174 crowns in 1907.

"The system by which owners of check accounts can make and receive payments outside Austria through the intermediary of the post-office savings bank has proved very useful. It was inaugurated in the first place in 1899 by a special arrangement made between the post-office savings bank and the Austro-Hungarian Bank. It offers persons participating in the clearing system of the Austrian Post-Office Savings Bank the possibility of transferring money from their account to any giro account of the Austro-Hungarian Bank, while persons with an account at that bank can make transfers by means of checks to accounts at the Austrian Post-Office Savings Bank. A similar arrangement has existed since 1896 with the Hungarian Post-Office Savings Bank, on the strength of which payments can be made reciprocally by the owners of check accounts in the two banks. Both these arrangements are used largely for the exchange of money in Austria and Hungary. In 1907, 98,000 transfers for 168,000,000 crowns were made in favor of account holders of the Austrian Post-Office Savings Bank and 16,000 transactions for 72,000,000 crowns through that of the Austro-Hungarian Bank. In the same year 15,300 transfers for 37,000,000 crowns were effected for account holders of the Austrian Post-Office Savings Bank to check accounts of the Hungarian Post-Office Savings Bank and 46,000 for 397,000,000 crowns to those of the Austro-Hungarian Bank.

"Since 1901 the Austrian post-offices in the Levant have gradually been opened for the check service; at the present time this service is in operation in the post-office at Constantinople, Beirut, Jaffa, Janina, Jerusalem, Saloniki, Scutari, and Smyrna.

"In 1906 the last extension was made and arrangements concluded with foreign banking houses by which the owners of check accounts in the post-office savings bank can make payments from clients residing abroad. Up to the present time arrangements have been made in Germany with the Deutsche Bank, in Italy with the Banca Commerciale Italiana, in Great Britain and Ireland with the London branch of the Österreichische Länderbank, and in Switzerland with the Schweizerische Kreditanstalt. The number of localities with which the post-office savings bank has relations through the intermediary of the above-mentioned banks is at present 774.

"The post-office savings bank does business in various ways with the stock market. We have already mentioned its transactions as intermediary for the purchase and sale of government stocks in favor of those who have accounts in the savings bank itself and in the check service. The value of the stocks purchased for its depositors since its creation is about 370,000,000 crowns. At the end of 1907 the savings bank had in its custody stocks to the value of 172,000,000 crowns, the property of 24,700 persons.

"A new field of usefulness was opened to the savings bank in 1889, when it took over from the administration of the state railways the custody and, in part, the administration of the provident benevolent fund for the employees of these railways and of the bonds given by the former.

"It also offers its clients the opportunity of keeping their valuables in security, by placing at their disposal, in a retired part of the central office building, a compartment fitted with fireproof safes.

"As the owners of accounts have the right of disposing of their capital at any moment without giving notice, the savings bank is obliged by law to keep on hand such sums proceeding from the check service as shall be deemed necessary for immediate use. The remainder is placed in different investments, preferably in such as permit of the money being realized at any moment; at the end of 1907 this remainder was invested as follows: One hundred and sixty-two million crowns in accounts current, Lombard and rediscount, which can be immediately realized, 23,000,000 crowns in saline shares, 62,000,000 crowns in government stocks, and 120,000,000 crowns in various others. A reserve fund, amounting to 5 per cent of the capital, is to be formed from the balance of the check service; this fund amounts accordingly to 18,000,000 crowns. The profits of the check service amounted in 1906 to 6,065,198 crowns, of the savings banks and check service together to 7,427,189 crowns.

"To what an extent the business of the savings bank in Vienna has grown may be gathered from the fact that in the check service alone there has been as many as 300,000 entries in one day, and that the staff employed in this service numbers 1,735, to which must be added the 441 persons employed in the savings bank. The savings-bank business having increased so rapidly from year to year, it was found necessary to erect new premises for the savings bank, which were finished and inaugurated in December, 1906. These buildings, a sketch of which is printed in the memorial, stand on a site of 5,465 square meters, 4,678 of which are built over; they have a frontage of 239 meters on 3 streets, are 8 stories high, and cost 3,000,000 crowns. Attention has been paid in the construction to the most modern theories as to light, ventilation, and sanitation, and the arrangement of the rooms and the mechanical appliances provided to meet great pressure of business prove to be all that could be desired for the successful working of the savings bank."

APPENDIX D.

Although the agitation for the establishment of postal savings banks in this country has thus far been fruitless, it appears from the following correspondence, furnished by the State Department, that it has had its effect elsewhere. The passages quoted were elicited as a result of the action taken by the President in response to a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on June 29, 1906.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chile, November 22, 1906.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have to acknowledge receipt of department's telegram of the 21st, as follows:

"When may department expect reply to instruction June 30 last in regard to postal savings banks?

"BACON, Acting."

I replied at once with the following:

"SECSTATE, Washington:

"Reply to postal savings banks inquiry mailed October 20. Like snakes in Ireland, no postal savings banks in Chile.

"HICKS."

I will say in regard to the apparent delay that department will see by the correspondence sent on the 29th of October that I presented the matter to the Chilean foreign office without delay, but that between the minister of foreign affairs and the minister of interior there was considerable time lost before the final answer was received at this legation.

It is interesting to note that the Chilean Government, evidently acting upon the suggestion inspired by my note of inquiry, decided to begin the operation of a postal savings bank system in a tentative manner.

Your obedient servant,

JOHN HICKS.

SANTIAGO, CHILE, October 19, 1906.

In answer to your note No. 1971 in which you ask from this department more information regarding the establishment of postal savings banks, I have the honor to transmit to your excellency the following dispatch from the director-general of post:

"Really, there are no postal savings banks in Chile. As a trial special post-offices have been authorized to act as agents of the savings banks, and the results obtained have been very encouraging, a fact which I have had the honor to explain in the memorandum which I presented to your excellency in May last. Informed about this result, the President of the Republic has manifested his desire of establishing the service of postal savings banks in the most important post-offices, and to this end the director is studying the manner in which this new service can be established in a more ample manner than that of the offices which have performed the functions of agents of the savings banks; and in a short time we will be able to submit to the consideration of the supreme government a project of the service of postal savings banks."

God guard your excellency.

J. A. FIGUEROA.

To the MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

It is correct:

CESAR DE LA LASTRA.

APPENDIX F.

The following quotations are from a few of the many letters of postmasters received at the Post-Office Department which refer to the purchase of money orders for savings purposes:

"Lodi, Cal.—Have received many inquiries during the past six months as to depositing savings with the Government through the Post-Office Department. Have explained to all, as best I knew, the advantages of postal savings banks, and believe the idea is popular.

"(I expect to have a deposit of $3,700 about April 20, from one person, which under present conditions will be a rather cumbersome affair to handle, the writing of 37 orders entailing much labor. It will also be expensive for the depositor, with no return except safety.)

"Waterbury, Conn.—Frequent calls have been made at this office for bank books by Italians.

"Savannah, Ga.—I find upon investigation that the amount was undoubtedly for savings purposes, in most instances the purchaser's signature was attached to the advice, and the statement was openly made that the object was to accumulate money.

"Galesburg, Ill.—There have been cases of orders payable to remitters. One man had $450 on hand here nine months; another put from $300 to $400 on deposit every month or so.

"Highland Park, Ill.— * * * Orders were made during the panic by a man who said he wanted to place his money where he could get it when he wanted it.

"Lincoln, Ill.—It is pertinent to add that there have been several inquiries from patrons as to the probable date when the postal savings bank would be effective.

"Mount Carmel, Ill.—The financial stringency and agitation regarding same attracted people's attention to the absolute security of the money-order system, and am satisfied that the money orders issued for savings purposes will show a large increase over the previous year.

"Morgan Park, Ill.—It was distinctly noticeable during the late panic that many sent money orders instead of drafts, expressing the hope in so doing that the payee could receive good money at the paying office. Large numbers besides these spoke of the necessity of a postal savings bank, where one could get cash whenever he needed it.

"Winona Lake, Ill.—We think offices like our own, located in places without a bank, could 'make good' with the postal savings system established.

"Chariton, Iowa.—This office has issued money orders for the purpose of safe-keeping. There is a growing tendency by payees of money orders not to immediately cash them, frequently asking how long they could carry same before payment would be refused. The withholding of such orders is for savings purposes. The tendency of this practice is more noticeable during the past five months.

"Knoxville, Iowa.—A great deal of inquiry was made concerning a postal savings bank. I am confident that quite a number of deposits would have been made if the depositor could have secured a small per cent of interest.

"Emporia, Kans.—Many patrons are holding orders, and when notified they say they do not want to cash them. Our advice case is fuller now of unpaid advices than ever before, and we attribute this to the purposely holding of the orders by the payees, thus making us as a place of deposit.

"Monson, Mass.—We have a large Italian population here who send large amounts to Italy, but who say they would keep their money here if we had postal savings banks.

"Stoughton, Mass.—I do find the last year money orders drawn upon this office (87 in number), which are left on file a long time, unpaid, of which the payees say that they are in no hurry, as the post-office is a good bank; I would rather it be there, as I know where it is and it is safe.

"About 25 per cent of all money orders to Italy, 50 per cent to Sweden, and 5 per cent to Russia are for savings purposes. Many of the newcomers from those countries ask about depositing money with the postmaster. It is a very live question.

"Gulfport, Miss.—We have had quite a number of applications from foreigners to deposit money in post-office, claiming that they were afraid to put it in banks. We could have handled a nice business at this post-office if we had the postal savings bank.

"Milford, N. H.—I have been requested by Italians to hold money for safety for them for quite large amounts, as they said that they were afraid of the banks.

"Hoboken, N. J.—There are at present domestic money orders lying in this office for savings purposes.

"Daily inquiries are made in regard to depositing money for savings purposes. About 15 per cent of international money-order business is sent for deposit in European banks, as shown by the manner in which the orders were drawn.

"Little Falls, N. Y.—We have had money orders from foreigners sending their money abroad to be deposited in postal savings banks, which they advised us would have been deposited here if we had a postal savings bank.

"Fargo, N. Dak.—* * * You will see that we have issued orders which apparently are savings deposits, and intended simply for safe-keeping funds, and in nearly all cases these orders are for $100 each."

This certainly shows that people have confidence in the Government, and are willing to go without interest, if they can only be sure to have their money when they may need it.

It is a great argument in favor of the postal savings measure when men will give up the interest in order to be sure and have their funds safe and available when they may desire to use the same.

"Cincinnati, Ohio.—Robinson's circus and Ringling Brothers' circus both go into winter quarters near this city; the members and employees live here. They go out in the spring, returning late in the fall. While 'on the road' they put all the money they can accumulate into post-office money orders, buying them at the towns which they make; they return and live on the proceeds of these money orders, which they cash from time to time as they need them. About two years ago John Robinson and wife cashed about $13,000 worth of such money orders at this office.

"Elyria, Ohio.—Orders were purchased payable to remitters at this office; I know that these amounts were deposited by them because of the money panic.

"Ardmore, Okla.—Orders have been issued here especially for savings purposes to foreigners who were afraid of the banks during the recent financial scare, and are still held by them.

"Muskogee, Okla.—There is quite a colony of Greeks here, and they send many foreign orders for savings purposes because of their fear of banks here. They do not care to make local investments, but would doubtless place the money in a postal savings bank if there were one.

"Allentown, Pa.—The foreign element is repeatedly asking of us whether money can not be deposited bearing interest.

"Clearfield, Pa.—I have had quite a few inquiries from foreigners asking if we had a postal savings bank that paid interest on deposits, and in my judgment there would be a great deal of money deposited by foreigners if there was interest paid them, and they are afraid of banks and have full confidence in the Government.

"Conshohocken, Pa.—Italian workmen recently asked that this office receive money on deposit. * * * In November an Italian, while sending $500 to a relative in Italy, told the postmaster he did it because the banks here were unsafe and that the Government in Italy would take care of the money there.

"Mount Pleasant, Pa.—Many inquiries in regard to postal savings fund have been made. During November our remittances of surplus funds was $20,230, much of which was sent to Europe, and could have been retained here had we had postal savings system.

"Pittsburg, Pa.—Numerous orders have been drawn for payment to savings banks in different foreign countries, particularly in Canada. There were also issued many orders payable to the postmaster-general, Ottawa, Canada. It is noticeable that orders are drawn daily to different savings banks for transmission to foreign savings banks.

"Ridgway, Pa.—About $1,000 is remitted from here monthly to foreign postal savings banks.

"Rochester, Pa.—A number of foreign orders were issued, the purpose of the remitter being to keep the money there until it should be needed here. They preferred to send it to the old country for safe-keeping rather than to deposit it in the American banks. It is my belief that a very large amount is sent away for safe-keeping.

"Mayaguez, P. R.—I have long been contemplating making a special report of just this very subject, and to this end have kept an accurate record of such transactions, which I have at hand at all times. There were 8 orders for $100 issued here for payment to the remitter. There were also 28 orders for $100 each issued here drawn for payment to the remitter at other places (in the United States) that were not cashed for six months, and I was informed by the remitter that he had no intention of cashing them earlier, and that his object was to be more secure. For this purpose he actually withdrew his money from a national bank.

"Beaumont, Tex.—We have on hand orders aggregating $8,864, all of which is clearly intended for savings.

"Bellows Falls, Vt.—Our patrons are calling for savings banks.

"Bellingham, Wash.—If we had a postal savings bank we would have easily $500,000 in deposits one year after it opened (last year 2,011 money orders issued for savings purposes, with total of $151,301).

"Everett, Wash.—There remains almost $19,000 still on deposit.

"Tacoma, Wash.—Besides the number and amount of orders used for savings purposes, 3,787 for $299,054, many persons buy orders at this office payable to themselves at smaller offices near by, where they live, so that they may secure payment at home if there are sufficient funds on hand or obtain repayments here.

"Also thousands of dollars are sent to foreign countries to the credit of remitters in government savings banks. One family has $11,000 on deposit in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada; another has $6,000 on deposit in Italy; another $5,000 in Switzerland, besides scores who have smaller amounts; and all these live here with their families, and intend to stay, using those banks for safety. I believe $100,000 is a conservative estimate of the amounts so deposited.

"Janesville, Wis.—Could deposits be made that would bear a small interest would have received $50,000 or more.

"Watertown, Wis.—During the financial trouble this winter some large orders were not collected until notice was sent to the payees, who then stated that they preferred to leave the money in the post-office in preference to depositing it in a bank or keeping the money themselves."

APPENDIX H.

Because of the diversity of opinion entertained as to the practicability of a postal savings depository system in this country, it is pertinent to append the following extracts from official reports of the postmaster-general of Great Britain, submitted in the years 1861 to 1864, both inclusive, during which period the post-office savings bank was passing through its experimental stages:

"1861.

"Post-office savings banks.—During the present session of Parliament an act has been passed 'to enlarge the facilities now available for the deposit of small savings, and to make the general post-office available for that purpose, with the security of the Government for the due repayment thereof.'

"The subject has engaged the attention of many persons from the year 1806, when Mr. Whitbread proposed a somewhat similar measure to Parliament; but it has recently been brought before the public and the Government most prominently by Mr. Sikes, of Huddersfield, who has devoted much time and attention to the question.

"The plan, in accordance with which the act recently passed was framed and which will be shortly put in operation, differs materially from all those which had been previously proposed, and will afford the depositors a more complete security and a much larger amount of accommodation than had been contemplated in any previous proposal.

"The machinery for carrying this scheme into effect has been chiefly framed and devised by Mr. Chetwynd, the bookkeeper of the money-order office, and Mr. Scudamore, the receiver and accountant-general, to whom I feel much indebted for the ability and care they have bestowed on the subject, and which I trust in practice will prove successful.

"1862.

"Post-office savings banks.—The post-office savings-bank act, entitled 'An act to grant additional facilities for depositing small savings at interest, with the security of the Government for the due repayment thereof,' was passed on the 17th May and was put into operation on the 16th September, on which day 301 post-office savings banks were opened in England and Wales. In the interval between the 17th May and the 16th September the regulations for the conduct of the banks, an abstract of which will be found in the appendix, were framed and the general arrangements for the receipt and disposal of the deposits were perfected.

"These arrangements received, as indeed the great importance of the measure demanded that they should receive, long and careful consideration; and I am happy in being able to state that they were found from the commencement of the banks to be effective and sufficient, that they have required little modification, and that they have been carried out without difficulty.

"The public appreciation of the advantages of the measure was evinced at a very early period by the numerous applications which I received for extensions of the scheme to particular localities, with which I readily complied until the complete success in practice of the arrangements for working the scheme justified a general extension of its advantages to all parts of the Kingdom.

"A return which will be found in the appendix gives the names of all places in the United Kingdom at which post-office savings banks are at present established, with the date on which each bank was opened; but I may state here that there are in all 2,532, viz:

England	1,795
Wales	129
Scotland	299
Islands	9

"According to the latest returns on the subject, the number of old savings banks in the United Kingdom is only 638.

"The extension of the scheme to Ireland and Scotland was effected on the 3d and 17th February, respectively.

"More than one-third of the whole amount deposited in the United Kingdom was received in London and the London district; that is, within 12 miles of the general post-office. One-half of the large sum received in Kent and ten-elevenths of the still larger sum received in Surrey were deposited in those portions of Kent and Surrey which lie within the limits of the London district. Staffordshire, Lancashire, Hampshire, Gloucestershire, and Yorkshire rank next, and in the order in which I have given them, after Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent.

"The following table gives the average amount of a deposit in the post-office savings banks and in old savings banks, according to the latest returns on the subject:

Country.	Average amount of a deposit in post-office savings banks.	Average amount of a deposit in old savings banks.
England	$18.16	$24.55
Wales	13.68	28.08
Scotland	8.25	16.64
Ireland	19.32	29.03
Islands	16.91	33.82
United Kingdom	17.68	23.87

"This table shows that the principal divisions of the United Kingdom are in the same relation to each other in the post-office savings banks as in the old savings banks, but it also shows that in each division of the Kingdom the post-office banks have reached a larger proportion of small depositors than the old savings banks have been able to attract. This gratifying result is doubtless attributable to the superior facilities given by the post-office banks, and especially to the fact that they are open daily and for several hours, and that they are situated almost at the door of the depositor.

"The total sum deposited in the United Kingdom up to the 31st of March included the sum of $677,277 transferred from old savings banks. A portion of this sum was transferred from the banks at Bermondsey, Braintree, Chesham, Cheshunt, Enfield, Hoxton, Kirkley, Stephen, Machynlleth, Carndonagh, and Gorey (Wexford), the trustees of which banks, having in view the superior facilities and the complete security afforded by the post-office banks, have determined to close the banks which they had hitherto maintained at some inconvenience to themselves for the benefit of their poorer neighbors. As it is exceedingly probable that the trustees of other savings banks may desire to follow a similar course of proceeding, I take this opportunity of stating that whenever any such intention is entertained I shall be glad to have early intimation in order that I may instruct my officers to render such assistance as may be required.

"The funds of friendly societies, charitable societies, and penny banks may be deposited in post-office savings banks on the following condition: Friendly societies duly enrolled or registered are entitled to pay in the whole of their funds; charitable or provident institutions may, with the approval of the postmaster-general, pay in an amount not exceeding £100 in the year or £300 in the whole; but the last-named institutions, first obtaining the sanction of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, may then pay the whole of their funds in like manner as friendly societies; and, lastly, penny banks, duly approved by the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, may pay in the whole of their funds.

"On these conditions upward of 700 friendly societies, charitable societies, and penny banks have already deposited their funds in post-office savings banks.

"I can not conclude this short notice of the progress of post-office savings banks without expressing my sense of the manner in which those who have had to carry out the measure have acted. During the progress of the post-office savings bank bill through Parliament some fear was expressed that the subpostmasters would fail to carry out the details of the measure. I had good reason to think that my officers in every department of the post-office would be able to perform the duties required of them, and I am happy in being able to state that their subsequent conduct has fully equaled my expectations. The postmasters throughout the country have lent themselves cheerfully and readily to the work, and instead of merely carrying out their instructions perfunctorily and in ordinary course have exerted themselves to make known and to explain the advantages of the post-office savings banks and to facilitate, so far as lay in their power, the transactions of the poorer depositors.

"The trustees of several of the old banks have already shown a disposition to relinquish the labor and responsibility which they have so long taken upon themselves from motives of benevolence and which are now no longer required of them.

* * * * * * *

"The voluntary retirement of the trustees of 36 of the old banks may be taken, I think, as a proof that the post-office banks are generally considered to have been efficiently conducted and to have provided sufficient savings-bank accommodation in a manner satisfactory to the public.

"The progress and the success of the post-office savings banks have been so frequently and so recently described as to render it unnecessary for me here to enter into a further statement of the steps taken in the department under my control to carry into effect the act for granting "additional facilities for depositing small sums at interest with the security of the Government for due repayment thereof."

"The tables printed at pages 11 and 17 of this report show that the post-office savings banks have been successful in every part of the country, and that 'additional facilities' which they have afforded have stimulated the growth of prudent and frugal habits throughout the whole population of the Kingdom. It is at once matter of surprise and gratification to find that in a period of only two years and a half from the date of their establishment they should have attracted and retained 372,000 depositors and that the accumulated fund belonging to these depositors should have reached the sum of four millions (about $20,000,000),[a] but it is a matter of greater gratification to find, what is abundantly proved by the tables above referred to, that by the establishment of post-office savings banks the legislature has effected, not a mere transfer of depositors from one establishment to another, but a real and considerable increase in the total number of saving persons throughout the Kingdom. Those columns of the above-cited tables which show the number of depositors in old savings banks prior to the establishment of post-office banks, the numbers in old banks and post-office banks combined on March 31, 1864, and the consequent increase in the total numbers of savings-bank depositors will furnish many interesting illustrations of my statements.[b]

"As until the post-office savings banks were established facilities for the safe investment of small sums were given chiefly in wealthy and densely populated places, it need not be matter of surprise that the proportion of savings-bank depositors to population is higher in such localities. In the London district there is one depositor (taking the depositors in old banks and those in post-office banks together) for every 7 persons; in the 107 postal districts of England and Wales, 1 for every 15 persons; in the rest of England and Wales, 1 for every 15 persons; in Scotland, 1 for every 17 persons; and in Ireland, 1 for every 68 persons. I hope that under the operation of the post-office savings-bank system the proportion of depositors to population will rise greatly, even in thinly populated districts."

[b] Whereas in each of the fifteen previous financial years the amount of deposits exceeded that of the withdrawals. In 1899, on the contrary, the latter exceeded the former by not less than 6,132,286 crowns (a crown being equal to 26.8 cents). This unfavorable result is due, on the one hand, to the fact that the rate of interest granted by private banks has been considerably increased during the year under review, and, on the other hand, to the fact that private banks now also accept small deposits on terms much more advantageous than those of the post-office savings bank, as they allow depositors to withdraw higher sums without giving notice in advance. Accordingly, a number of depositors who had invested their savings in the post-office savings bank when the rate of interest was higher than in private banks withdrew their capital to invest in the latter banks.

[b] There is but one bank in New Zealand which may be properly termed a "savings bank"—the Savings Bank of Victoria—and it is operated in conjunction with the postal savings-banks. Concerning this state of affairs, a recent British official report states: "On June 30, 1905, the Savings Bank of Victoria, with which have been amalgamated the post-office savings banks, had 54 banks and branches, with 328 agencies at post-offices in the states."

[c] One hundred and sixty-seven thousand three hundred and eighty accounts having small balances, which had had no transactions, for a considerable period, were transferred to the dormant account in the year 1876, and a similar transfer of 21,779 accounts was made in 1877. The number of open accounts (depositors) was reduced accordingly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Montana takes his seat, I wish to ask him if in any of these exhibits—I think the report is not yet printed; at least I have not seen it—there is a law of any of the countries to which the Senator calls attention as having adopted this system; that is, anything whereby we can make a comparison between the law as proposed now and the laws of other countries?

Mr. CARTER. Great pains were taken by the committee to collect not only the laws but the rules and regulations prescribed by foreign governments for the administration of the postal system in their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice in the bill, as the Senator has explained, that the present bill differs materially from the former bill, in that we do not undertake to prescribe the rules and regulations, but we leave that to a commission or——

Mr. CARTER. A board of trustees.

Mr. GALLINGER. A board of trustees. I think that is a very decided improvement, so far as the administration of a law of this kind is concerned, and I am very glad that that change has been made.

Mr. President, at a later time during this discussion I shall want to ask the Senator from Montana for explanations of some features of the bill, which very likely he will give in a satisfactory way, so far as my mind is concerned.

This is an experiment, so far as our country goes, and I think we ought to take abundant time to look into this matter very carefully, with a view of not making a mistake. We hurried, I think, a little more rapidly than we ought to have done, a provision through Congress at the last session, providing for a tax upon corporations. It was rather a popular idea. The administration wanted it, and Congress, in its wisdom or unwisdom, enacted it. And now we are being deluged with letters and protests—at least I am, and I venture to say other Senators are—against certain provisions in that law, saying that it is impossible of execution and it ought to be repealed.

So I say that in this matter I think there ought not to be, and probably will not be, any undue haste, and that we ought to give it careful and patient consideration, with a view of having the bill as near right as it is possible to have it if it is to become a law.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the observations of the Senator from New Hampshire with reference to improvements in the bill are, I think, meritorious. The bill as originally presented, and, indeed, as all bills presented prior to the present session of Congress on this subject have, undertakes to prescribe administrative details with great particularity. The discussion during the last Congress on the postal savings bill then pending showed that Senators differed more on the details than on the elementary or fundamental principles involved.

It was suggested that if deposits were received from individuals in 51,000 post-offices the depositors would probably run into many millions. Indeed, I think there are 11,000,000 depositors in the United Kingdom now. These depositors have between seven and eight hundred million dollars on deposit. The average deposit in the United Kingdom is about $70.

In view of the suggestions then made with reference to the extent of this business in foreign countries, Senators suggested that we would develop such an enormous number of accounts that the system would break down of its own weight. The bill considered in the last Congress provided that when a deposit was made at a post-office the postmaster should enter the amount thereof in a book, and he should then immediately write a letter to the Postmaster-General, telling him the name of the depositor, the date, and the amount of the deposit. It then provided that the Postmaster-General should within a stipulated number of days send notice to this depositor that the deposit had been reported to the headquarters.

This, it will be perceived, would result in putting two letters into the office—one from the postmaster to the Postmaster-General, another from the Postmaster-General to the depositor—and it was manifest that it might be very cumbersome and result in a demand for a very large clerical force.

Upon considerations such as these the committee during the present session of Congress, consulting the laws of other countries on this subject as well, concluded that it would be better to leave to the board of trustees authority to prescribe the details of administration in the light of the experience of other countries and such experience as they might acquire from time to time. It was believed that it would be unwise to prescribe in a rigid law a course of accounting and a method of procedure which might be very cumbersome and expensive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana will suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived. The unfinished business will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, with the elimination of the administrative details the bill is very much reduced in volume, very much simplified, and, I think, very much improved.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire at this time to submit one or two inquiries that we may know before the bill is laid aside the views of the committee in regard to certain features.

Is it contended, or will it be, by the committee, that rules and regulations established relative to the acknowledgment of deposits and the notification of the depositor can be done at less expense by the administrative rules and regulations than by provisions such as were contained in the bill that we considered in the last Congress?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, at this time the Post-Office Department, or some of those connected with it, have in contemplation a stamp system which will obviate the necessity of any kind of correspondence excepting to check up postmasters' receipts as they are checked up now on money orders. I do not know that that can be developed so as to be completely successful, but those engaged in the work of improving upon the suggestion believe that it can be made feasible. An individual will have delivered to him a small book, which he can readily carry about his person. That book will be presented to the post-office and there he may buy a stamp. He signs his own name upon the stamp. The postmaster observes him paste it in the book. Upon the presentation of the stamp he can get his money and the stamp will be canceled. There is a great variety of ways in which it is possible to get rid of the interminable amount of accounting, which seems to be one of the menaces to the operation of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Again, I should like to ask the Senator what provision is contained in the bill for recovering from the bank in which the deposits are made the money so deposited?

Mr. CARTER. Of course, the deposits are made payable to the Government on demand. The bill provides that the banks shall furnish indemnity bonds, such as the board of trustees may prescribe and approve.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it contemplated that the Government may at any time, without notice, require the banks to make available the sums deposited? I find no restriction in the bill.

Mr. CARTER. There is no restriction except this, to wit, that portion of the bill which requires that the deposits shall be maintained ratably according to the capital and surplus of the banks in a particular neighborhood.

Mr. HEYBURN. That provides for getting the money into the banks. I want to know where the provision is to be found for getting it out.

Mr. CARTER. The banks give bonds for the repayment of the money on demand.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I find no specification of conditions under which the Government may withdraw the money, as to notice, the amount of deposits, or any of those details that were provided for, I think, or intended to be, by the former bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or in regard to savings banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. But I do not find any provision at all in the bill for getting the money out of the banks. That is quite as important as getting it in.

Mr. CARTER. The money is a demand deposit in the banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. With no restriction in favor of the banks as to the amount to be withdrawn or the notice to be given?

Mr. CARTER. None, save such rules and regulations as the directors may prescribe. Upon an examination of the bill the Senator will find the following language in the first section:

> All regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed by said board of trustees.

And in that portion of the bill relating to the deposit in bank, the Senator will find the same power of regulation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator, Is it not true that the bill merely authorizes this board to establish postal savings banks in effect? Does it go further, inasmuch as the Senator has just called my attention to the language, which I have before me, than to provide that all regulations covering these questions shall be made by the board? We will be legislating in the dark; we do not know what regulations they will make.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the only regulation they can make under that provision of the bill is for the receipt, transmission, etc., of the deposits. We believe——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the whole process. There is nothing else contained in the system of postal savings banks except the process of receiving the money, acting as the custodian of it, and paying it back. All of that we pass over, delegating it to this board of three men.

Mr. CARTER. Subject, however, to this condition, to wit, that the board may not adopt any regulation in conflict with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. But there are no provisions of the bill on the subject, so they could not possibly conflict with it.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator will find that section 8, providing for the deposits and the disposition and investment of the money, constitutes a very clear and distinct limitation of power.

Mr. HEYBURN. But none as to the withdrawal of the money.

Mr. CARTER. That money must, I think, be left subject to the check of the board.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it does not say so; and there is no limitation as to the manner in which they are to withdraw it. They might withdraw it all at once and wreck every bank in the country.

Mr. CARTER. The Secretary of the Treasury can now withdraw all deposits in the depository banks of the country instantly; and we could not safely prescribe any condition by which he could properly be restrained from withdrawing the money of the United States from deposit in banks when the public interest demanded it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very small item compared with this.

Mr. CARTER. Our purpose in creating a board was to remove from one officer the power to transfer these funds or to engage in any such drastic action as the Senator's question is based upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to inquire as to section 7? It provides:

> That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe.

Is there any other provision than that relating to withdrawal?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, if this bill is enacted and becomes a law, we will not know upon what terms and conditions or under what limitations the deposits may be withdrawn or by what process.

Mr. CARTER. We will know as soon as the rules are promulgated. Originally we undertook to prescribe the number of days' notice, and to prescribe the method of applying for repayment, but we found that this simply encumbered the statute in a manner that in the course of the administration of the act might be found very undesirable.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator recall any legislation in the history of this country where we have created a financial agency of this kind and made no law as a basis of the rules and regulations that might govern it?

Mr. CARTER. On the lines and within the domain now contemplated by the Senator's inquiry and discussion, I say we have no law, rules, or regulations which prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from checking from one bank to another. As I understand the Senator, he suggests that we should restrict the checking of money in the various banks in which this board, under the law, may cause deposits to be made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think no more important provision pertains to this class of legislation than that we should establish the bounds within which the rules and regulations may apply.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to emphasize the thought just suggested by the Senator from Idaho. If there is no such restraint the bill is very faulty; but I suggest that the very purpose of the bill is to keep on deposit in the various banks of the country the moneys that are collected at the post-offices, and by the terms of the bill the money that comes into the post-office in any particular city or town is to be deposited in the banks of that city or town.

Mr. HEYBURN. If they will receive it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If those banks will take the money and pay 2½ per cent interest upon it.

Now, the Government ought not to be permitted to withdraw this money at all, except as it becomes necessary to repay it to the depositors upon their demand. If the bill would permit the Treasurer of the United States or this board of trustees to withdraw all the money that had been deposited in the various banks of the country and redeposit that money at some other place or places, or deposit it in the Treasury of the United States, it at once meets a criticism from which, in my opinion, it could not recover. The very notion is that this money shall remain in these banks until withdrawn for the purpose of repaying deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is under a misapprehension. I had long since passed from the section that relates to the withdrawal of the money by the Government. I was speaking of section 7, which I had read, and which relates to the withdrawal by the depositor.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I had attempted to recall the Senator to the former section.

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg pardon; there is no objection to going back to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I tried to secure the Senator's notice before. I want him to look further into that view of the question he propounded to the Senator from Montana, because if there is anything in the bill which would permit a general withdrawal of the deposits that are made throughout the country and their concentration at any point, either in the Treasury or in the money centers of the country, a provision to prevent it would at once, as it seems to me, become very advisable. But I know that was not the purpose of the committee.

Mr. CARTER. Let me say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that it seems to me that section 8, governing this matter, leaves no possible opening through which the concentration to which the Senator from Idaho refers can occur. Now, let us see——

Mr. CUMMINS. Do not understand me as insisting that it does bear that interpretation; but the point made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] rather interested me, for I have been fighting very vigorously for a year against any such possibility.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator correctly interprets the section. The section was framed with a view to preventing the concentration of the postal funds in the Treasury or in any particular section of the country. The committee had in mind the injurious effects destined to follow the stripping of localities of the ready money needed to transact their business from day to day. It was designed that this depository system should not be used or available for the impoverishment of the currency in any locality, but rather to strengthen it. Now, let us see what happens, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I want briefly to answer the Senator, so that we need not return to this again.

A postmaster receives, we will assume, deposits of $1,000 to-day. At the close of business—the business hour at the post-office being later than the banking hour—he makes up his account, and to-morrow morning he deposits $1,000 in the local bank, if there be but one. If there be two, he will be required, within reasonable latitude, to keep the amounts balanced up, so that the banks will enjoy these deposits ratably. If the banks in the town refuse to receive the money and pay 2½ per cent interest upon it, or refuse to put up the required and approved indemnity bond, the next nearest bank which is willing to comply will have the money deposited with it. So throughout the State this will proceed. But if all the banks in the State decline the deposit, then what happens? The board may invest in the securities of the United States or in certain other classes of securities. In the last analysis there is no way to escape the investment in the securities if the banks refuse to receive the money. In that event, the securities of the United States and of the various States, counties, and Territories will be the only source of investment, because, Mr. President, the bill provides that the reserve to be kept in the Treasury of the United States shall not exceed 10 per cent. That reserve, let me say, will be kept in the Treasury for this very sufficient reason, to wit——

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, I should like to ask the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I will in a moment. The reserve will be kept for this purpose. There will be 22,000 banks, perchance, receiving these deposits throughout the country. It may be only 20,000. The department can not, in the nature of things, keep 22,000 check books at hand to send out money to persons who demand repayment. I assume that in the course of operations, when a depositor is to be paid, he will be sent a Treasury draft for the amount of his deposit.

Mr. HEYBURN. Right there, if the Senator will permit me, what provision of law is there that certainly provides for any fund against which to draw such a check or draft?

Mr. CARTER. The reserve fund.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but a reserve fund is not provided for except in the contingency that the banks refuse deposits.

Mr. CARTER. But, independent of the banks and independent of investment, there is a reserve fund of not more than 10 per cent kept in the Treasury as a working balance.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then there ought to be an exception in the provision which requires money to be deposited in the banks. It should say that 90 per cent in money shall be deposited in the banks, because if they deposit in the banks all the money they receive and the banks receive it, where are you going to get a reserve fund against which the Government may draw a draft?

Mr. CARTER. I assume that the regulations would be in harmony and not in conflict with the law, and certainly the courts would hold that they must so harmonize.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to finish the inquiry which I wanted to submit, and then I shall cheerfully yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not intend to argue these questions at this time, except merely to point them out. I do not find any provision in the bill under which the depositor may go to any place and get his money. To what place may he go? To what place shall he go?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, we undertook in the bills formerly presented and considered here to cover details of that kind. We have now relegated such details to the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the board of trustees.

Mr. HEYBURN. That answers me sufficiently. Now, then, when this bill becomes a law the depositors, or the contemplated depositors, in this country will not know where they are expected to go to get their money, will they? They will not know until some one has made a rule or a regulation covering it.

Mr. CARTER. I assume that the rules and regulations will be prescribed before anybody is permitted to make a deposit.

Mr. HEYBURN. How can a rule or regulation be prescribed under a law before it is enacted?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, well, nobody will do any business of this kind until the law is enacted, and the Senator from Idaho will observe that this act is to go into effect three months after its passage.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Within that period of three months, I assume, the trustees will promulgate all the needful rules and regulations for the guidance and instruction of depositors.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, in making up our minds as to the wisdom of this legislation, and in the making up of the minds of the great public that is watching us, what assurance have they that an adequate and convenient method of withdrawing their deposits will be provided for? Will the law be perfect when it says that the depositor may deposit money without saying when he can get it out and whether he shall draw it at the local post-office or at the bank or at the Treasury of the United States? He will want to know how convenient it is going to be to get his money back again.

Mr. CARTER. If this bill is enacted, the law will especially provide—

That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest——

Mr. HEYBURN. How?

Mr. CARTER. After complying with the rules and regulations prescribed.

Mr. HEYBURN. What are those rules and regulations going to be?

Mr. CARTER. We shall be compelled to consult the board, after they have consulted the experience of other countries and devised thoroughly practicable provisions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Most assuredly they will have to give notice. How much notice will they be required to give?

Mr. CARTER. I presume the methods will be similar to those in force in other countries.

Mr. HEYBURN. Which other countries?

Mr. CARTER. Countries like France, for instance.

Mr. HEYBURN. The regulations vary in every country.

Mr. CARTER. I have no doubt, then, the Senator from Idaho is thoroughly informed with reference to other countries; but there may be some others who have not the information and may not be so well informed. So I will state that, as a rule, an application is made at the post-office where the depositor has his account; that application goes to the point where the books are kept—the central station; the central station determines what amount is due the depositor if he desires to close his account, and sends a check for the amount direct to the party, and charges it up.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a supposition as to what will be. The regulations were contained in the other bill. Why not have allowed them to remain if it is expected that is the method which will be adopted?

Mr. CARTER. For this reason, among others, Mr. President, that for the purposes of administration the country will be divided into postal zones, so that everyone will not be required to correspond with the Postmaster-General at Washington. The business of New England will be in a postal zone with headquarters at Boston; the business of the South will be at Atlanta or some central point in the South; so that the business of different sections will be within compact zones, as I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. Who will establish the zones?

Mr. CARTER. The zones will be established by the board of trustees, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. The establishment of those zones will necessarily imply the officers, headquarters, and the machinery for business. Who will provide for that?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, that necessary machinery will be provided for by this board having charge of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why not provide for it by an act of Congress?

Mr. CARTER. For the simple reason that we can not now, in the light of our inexperience, if you please, determine just what method experience may show to be best.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will that board be wiser and more competent than Congress?

Mr. CARTER. I rather think they will be more efficient than Congress in working out the details, just as a small committee of this body is generally more direct and efficient than the whole body itself in reaching a conclusion or in investigating the minute details of a business transaction.

Mr. HEYBURN. The committee has had the same opportunity which the board will have. Is not the present Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads as well qualified to make these provisions as was the former committee?

Mr. CARTER. We thought we did very well last year; but we got into a wilderness of details, from the discussion of which we could not emerge in any direction.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, then, was it concluded—do not take this in the wrong spirit—that you might slip up on the people with a postal savings bill that was only a skeleton, so that they would not know what they were getting, and then apply it afterwards by an irresponsible board?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the board is hardly irresponsible. The Senator will recall that the bill reported in the Sixtieth Congress placed the entire business of this new departure under the Postmaster-General.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but under defined limitations in the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Under defined limitations in the bill; and because the discussion here, which lasted from December until March and extended to some extent over almost every day, disclosed the fact that this Senate would never agree on all the details of administration——

Mr. HEYBURN. "Never" is a long day.

Mr. CARTER. "Never" is a long day, but I venture to say that the details of the administrative work would occupy this Senate indefinitely; that we never would accomplish the desired end in our efforts to get out a set of rules and regulations satisfactory to anybody. Then the law would have the great inherent defect of being rigid in its bad as well as its good features. The Senator will readily admit that we might provide certain rigid rules of law that would prove in actual practice an incumbrance to the system and a useless burden of expense.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, it follows that if we had as Members of Congress these three officers of the administrative branch of the Government we might find some relief in their presence, but who will be the members three years from now of this—what do you call it—not a commission——

Mr. CUMMINS. Board of trustees.

Mr. CARTER. Board of trustees.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well. Board of trustees. Who will constitute the personnel of that board in three years from now, and what assurance have we that they will be competent?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator is trying to draw me out as a political prophet, and I refuse to be so drawn. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, I think we must ask these questions, and if they are not answered by others, we must answer them to ourselves and to the people.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the board will consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General. I believe in the future, as in the past, the three officers designated can be trusted to manage an ordinary business detail with intelligence and, most assuredly, with integrity.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I presume that we could find members of that board with sufficient experience in financial matters and in banking to administer the affairs of almost any bank in the country; but we are proposing to place in the hands of a board that changes with every administration, and sometimes even during an administration, the management of a financial system that no board of three men in the world ever was intrusted with, even though it were known that they were men trained in the conduct of financial institutions, and that every one of their successors would be. This bill proposes a skeleton to the people, the flesh and muscle and brain of which is to be supplied by three men, no one of whom is invested with legislative power, but only invested with the ordinary passing wisdom of political appointees, a body the like of which never has been created in any country. There is no country in the world where three men govern such a business.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Postmaster-General of Great Britain is practically absolute in the administration of the postal savings-bank system of that country. In France the system is managed by a board of 22——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; by 22.

Mr. CARTER. And that board, to a considerable extent, serves without compensation. The British system is based upon the merest skeleton; the French system upon a mere skeleton; and in no country has any legislative body attempted to foresee all the contingencies of business, and to provide rules of law for things that are not yet in sight. Mr. President, it will be necessary, and imperatively necessary, to leave to this board the right to be guided by the wisdom which experience alone can furnish in managing the details of the business, subject to——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment——

Mr. CARTER. Subject to the directions of law which the bill contains. Now, what are they? There is no skeleton here; there is substance, vital power, in the law which we propose to enact. First, it creates this postal savings-bank system. It provides that three persons, not mentioning them by name, but acting ex officio, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, shall constitute the board of managers. This board of managers shall prescribe certain rules and regulations for the receipt of money at the post-offices and its repayment. The law provides what shall be done with it when it is received, and leaves nothing to the discretion of the board in that behalf.

Mr. HEYBURN. What does the law provide shall be done with this money when received?

Mr. CARTER. The law provides that it shall be deposited in the bank nearest the place received——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not doing anything with the money.

Mr. CARTER. That it shall be deposited ratably; that it shall be deposited at not less than 2¼ per cent interest; and that if the banks——

Mr. HEYBURN. That does not answer the question.

Mr. CARTER. And if the banks refuse to receive it, then it may be invested in the manner prescribed in the act.

Mr. President, upon fair consideration of this whole bill, the Senator will recall his statement that it is a bare skeleton and conclude, I am sure, that it has every needful safeguard, from the receipt of the dollar to its return to the depositor with interest, that the law can throw about the transaction without prescribing hampering details likely to prove expensive and injurious.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has suggested another bare spot on this skeleton. That is as to the limitations upon the banks that receive the money and the manner of its distribution and entry into the business of the country. There is no provision in this bill that would restrict a bank from sending every dollar of postal savings deposits as a reserve to be held in a center of speculation, to be used for sustaining the stock market. Are we to take it for granted that all the banks are upon that high plane of intelligence and integrity that there is no danger of that, in the light of the fact that it is not eighteen months since just that thing was done, when the banks, in violation of their moral obligation to the depositors, loaned their money for speculative purposes and we stood marking time financially here for months until some method of relief could be devised? Does not the Senator think that some provision in the nature of a restriction should be imposed upon these custodians of the money of the people?

Mr. CARTER. I for one shall be glad to consider any amendment the Senator may propose on that subject. I do not quite know what his idea is, from his explanation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will probably relieve the Senator from that embarrassment. Under the provisions of this bill the banks receiving the deposits in any place, or at all places, can send this money just where they choose. It is not under the restrictive influence and control of the national-bank act. By the way, can a national bank pay interest on money on general deposit under any existing law? Can the Senator tell me that?

Mr. CARTER. I know that that is quite universally done, but I will ask the Senator what law there is preventing one national bank from sending its money to another bank?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that develops a most interesting condition of mind that is not without a precedent. Have we reached the period where, in the absence of legislation upon any subject, people may do as they please, whether in office or out? Have we reached a point where the officials of the Government, because they are not specifically restrained or enjoined from doing a thing, may do it under a general power? I have heard this suggestion, but I have never known any man to speak responsibly in support of such a doctrine. I have read what some men have said, that where they are not restricted they have a free hand to act; but this body will not adopt that rule.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, would the Senator favor an amendment restricting the use of the money by the bank receiving these deposits to the county in which the bank may be located?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. It does not follow that a man shall be absurd because he is reasonable.

Mr. CARTER. But I desire to know the geographical limits to which the Senator would confine the activities of the bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. Geography is not the rule; it is the character of the use.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator suggested that it might be sent to New York or somewhere else. Would he prohibit the sending of money to New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would prohibit the banks of the country from sending their reserves to New York in excess of the reserves they are required to carry to protect their drafts, and I have always been opposed to it. The money of the community belongs morally to the business interests of that community, and if it is to be sent out, let individuals do it. The class of people that will place their money in the hands of the Government for safe-keeping and to reap some interest from it are entitled to a different kind of custody for their funds from that of the depositor of large means who goes to a bank, has no use for his money, and says, "Here is my deposit; I do not want to keep it in my house." The people who will take advantage of any postal savings law are not people who are accustomed to large financial transactions, and they will take it for granted that on any hour in any day during business hours they can go to some convenient place and get their money back.

Take a town with, say, 2,000 or 4,000 people, who work on the average for $100 or so a month, and deposit $50. They put in that bank a very large sum of money every month. There are few banks that carry in cash the sum represented by the deposits of 4,000 people working in our mines. If they were to go to the bank and ask for their money, which they are entitled to withdraw under the general terms of this bill, what reply would they receive? They would be told: "We have sent this money away; we have invested it; we have it not at hand." Then in what position would the depositor be? He would then call on the Government of the United States, while probably his local bills would be pressing him, and he would say, "I deposited this money; I want to draw it; and the local depository say, 'We have it not in hand.'" Then there would have to be some action by the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. The time would come, and come speedily, when the Government would have to issue bonds to make good its pledge to these people.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Idaho, Mr. President, is under a misapprehension. This bill does not create any relation between the postal depositor and the postal depositories. It does not create any relation, in other words, between the men who deposit money in the post-office and the banks.

Mr. CARTER. That is correct.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was more skillful in framing my statement than I thought I would be.

Mr. CUMMINS. The banks deal only with the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have developed exactly the position that I was directing my remarks against. The point of responsibility is not fixed by this bill, but it is to be fixed by some other legislation, through a delegated power to legislate. That is just what I wanted to develop.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Idaho is in error about that. The Government deposits certain money in the banks of the country. It is the Government's money.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has a right to call for it whenever it chooses to call for it. If the bank does not want to take the money under that condition, it does not have to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that thoroughly well.

Mr. CUMMINS. It can be no hardship to any bank to operate under any rule or regulation that may be prescribed, subject to that fundamental principle.

Mr. HEYBURN. But who is the Government's agent to repay the money? That is what I am after.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho deposits money in a bank. Is it doing that bank any injustice that the Senator from Idaho shall go the next week or the next month and say to the bank, "I want my money," if the bank has taken it with the understanding that the Senator may call for it at any time he desires?

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, I am not raising any such question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not understand what hardship or difficulty arises in such a case as that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am raising no such question. I started out to demonstrate that there was no agency of the Government for the repayment of this money denominated in the bill or provided for, and what I said about the position of the bank and its custody of the money was merely to demonstrate the fact I had stated, that this bill makes no provision for the repayment of the money to the depositor. I am not dealing with the question of the banks.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, of course the Senator has the text of the bill on his desk, and I desire, with his permission, to answer his question by reading from the bill. On page 1 it is provided that—

Section 7 provides—

> That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, that does not provide a manner or a method, nor does it designate an agency through which the act is to be done. You might just as well say that the money shall be returned to the depositors, as may be provided by act of Congress to be enacted in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, would the Senator have us provide the form of check or application?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; not necessarily so. I do not know whether I would or not.

Mr. CARTER. Would the Senator have us prescribe the color of the paper on which the application is to be printed?

Mr. HEYBURN. That does not strike me as a profound inquiry.

Mr. CARTER. It is a pertinent one, though it may not be profound.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would have the law designate the representative of the Government through whom or by whom the money should be repaid, whether it be a bank, a post-office, the National Treasury, or whomsoever.

Mr. CARTER. The payments may be made from the banks or the Treasury, as the board may elect.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where is the law?

Mr. CARTER. It may be found in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where?

Mr. CARTER. The law authorizes the necessary rules and regulations.

Mr. HEYBURN. What are they? I do not find the rules and regulations printed here in this bill.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will see them promulgated long before any deposit is received.

Mr. HEYBURN. Promulgated by whom?

Mr. CARTER. By the board authorized by law to promulgate them.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, we are going to delegate to this board the power to legislate as to the obligations of the United States and how they are to be kept? I think not.

Mr. CARTER. Not at all; but merely to execute a law of Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. What law?

Mr. CARTER. The law which we propose to put upon the statute books.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do you call it executing a law to incorporate in a measure provisions for rules and regulations to be promulgated by some board upon the neglect of their enactment by Congress? We neglect to do it; and are we going to allow a board, nonlegislative in character, to legislate?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know where the Senator would stop in criticising the bill. You must leave it to somebody to determine the form of banks to be employed. You must leave it to somebody to determine whether they will pay from the central fund here in Washington, the reserve fund, or pay by checks on the banks. You must leave it to somebody to determine the kind of paper to be used in the pass books, the manner in which the correspondence shall be conducted and the business transacted; and that is all that is left to the trustees.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Constitution does that. It says we shall do it. Are we going to say that somebody whom we can not name even three months from now shall do it?

Mr. CARTER. In every department of this Government rules and regulations of executive officers are necessary to make laws workable in practice.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not to make laws.

Mr. CARTER. The Treasury Department prescribes its own system of bookkeeping. It selects the kind of paper to be used. It tells the quality of it. It determines how the mail shall be received, and the man by whom it shall be opened, and a thousand and one details that, of course, Congress can not undertake to prescribe.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question, if the Senator from Idaho will yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the objection to providing in the law a limitation within which a deposit may be withdrawn from the place where it has been made—from the postoffice wherein the money was originally deposited? What is the harm of that? If we are going to merely augment the business of state and national banks; if we are going to refer everyone who applies for the return of his money to a regularly constituted agency, what are we doing this for?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Michigan will realize that every postmaster in this country can not open a set of books with these postal depositors.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very likely not.

Mr. CARTER. The accounts will be kept either at Washington or at central places in sections of the country, as the board may determine.

When a man proposes to withdraw money, even from a bank, it is necessary to consult the books of the bank as to whether he has the money on deposit.

Let this be understood. Let there be no misunderstanding about it. It is not the purpose of this bill or of anybody connected with the committee, so far as I know, to make this bill the basis of a banking business, or to create a bank out of the postoffice for the transaction of ordinary banking business. It is merely for the purpose of enabling persons so disposed to accumulate small sums of money by depositing them where they believe the money will be secure.

Mr. HEYBURN. In other words, it is constituting an agency of deposit for people who have money, treating them as though they were not capable of depositing the money in banks. The Government says, "We will, at great expense, institute a system of gathering up your money and putting it in the bank." But it does not tell them how they are to get it out.

Mr. CARTER. The law tells them.

Mr. HEYBURN. No law in existence, nor anything written in any law here proposed. It is the promise, not of the law, but of an immoral substitute for law—rules and regulations given the force and effect of law. Could you sue for your rights under the rules and regulations? Could you set it forth in the pleadings? You generally have to recover in court upon a law.

Mr. CARTER. Would the Senator have it repaid by the postmasters?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would have it repaid by a designated agency invested not only with the rights but charged with the responsibility for the handling of this money.

Mr. CARTER. Then, the Senator would designate one agency, or three, or four, or a hundred?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would have a convenient agency in the neighborhood where the money was deposited.

Mr. CARTER. Then the Senator would have to keep all the accounts of that neighborhood in the neighborhood.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it is too much trouble or too much expense to execute a law, let us not enact it.

Mr. CARTER. I suppose that is what the Senator from Idaho objects to—the proposed enactment of the law. I would be glad if the Senator would suggest any amendment he has which would enable him to point out to the Senate in a specific way the kind of agencies he would like to designate for the repayment of these funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall not propose any amendment to this bill until I see danger closer at hand in the way of its passage. If we are compelled to accept this kind of legislation under our form of government, I may then be inspired to help to make it the least harmful possible.

Mr. CARTER. Under those conditions, I would admonish the Senator to prepare his amendment, because the hour is near at hand.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will have to be left to the exercise of my own judgment in that matter. I met with something of the same suggestion from the Senator from Montana last year when we were considering a bill of this kind, and the hour of danger in that case did not really approach very closely.

Mr. CARTER. The versatility of the Senator from Idaho is very charming to behold. Last year he objected to the bill because it had too many details and now he objects to it because it has too few details.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very——

Mr. CARTER. I imagine the Senator from Idaho is strongly opposed to this measure on general principles.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not on general principles; on specific principles.

Mr. CARTER. Then, I would be glad to have the Senator announce his specific objections, rather than to go into the question of providing by legislation as to the color of the paper which shall be used.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will undoubtedly, in my feeble way, announce them before this discussion closes. I imagine the bill will hardly reach a final vote this afternoon.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the word "feeble" had better be stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. I recognize the skill of the Senator from Montana in the use of words, but I will have to be given some latitude on that subject.

Mr. President, it is not my intention at all to enter into a general discussion of this bill; but I think it was not only proper but right, when the Senator in charge of the bill, a member of the committee, and the Senator who reported it submitted it to us for the first time, to develop the position of the committee and those speaking for it, in order that we might arrange it more logically in our minds and that we might not dwell upon matters which could be readily explained away. I shall not attempt at this time to do more than to say that I think this bill will have to be changed in many material particulars before it will be accepted by this or any other legislative body; and I do not think we are in a mood at this time to turn over the enactment of legislation, not to a department of the Government, but to some individuals as shifting as the sands of the sea.

Can Senators cast their minds back over the personnel of the Postmaster-General's office or the Attorney-General's office and see what we would have to rely upon in the way of wisdom in financial matters? A bank with a capital of a billion dollars in five years! That is what it amounts to—that much of the money of people the least able of all to take care of their own affairs; those who have little sums of money and little experience in the handling of it. They, because of their lack of experience, have held out to them this pretense, "Give me your money and I will take care of it for you." The citizen says, "When am I going to get it back?" The Government says, "We will make some provision for that or allow somebody else to make some provision for that." The citizen says, "How am I going to get it?" The Government says, "That will be provided for, too." The people will probably want to know before they let you have their money what that provision is going to be.

It does not follow that because postal savings banks meet with the approval of other countries or the people of other countries, or that they have been commended in some political platform, that anything that is submitted to us constitutes a postal savings-bank system within the hopes and the necessities of the people who will be its victims.

You establish a postal savings bank and gather together a billion dollars of money of the poor and loan it out to the banks who refuse them credit when they go to their doors; you loan it out to them upon the indefinite class of securities mentioned in this bill, and the people will rend you the first opportunity they get. They will say, "We want no more of a legislative body that leads us into a trap and a snare of this kind. Where is our money?" You have the old Freedmen's Savings Bank and a few of those efforts as very slight examples of the condition you would have to face. When this vast sum of money is gathered together and deposited in the banks under the conditions provided for in this bill, you will never get it out. You will issue bonds some day to repay the deluded depositors.

I cast my eyes over the figures of bank failures from 1892 to 1896 in connection with the consideration of this bill, and if I am not entirely wrong in my calculation, some five, yes, more than six, hundred million dollars of these deposits would have been involved in those failures. Under the conditions that existed eighteen months ago they would all have been involved and all would have ceased payment. In what shape would these deposits have been at that time? Even the Government could not get its money out of those banks. We had $400,000,000 tied up that was absolutely unavailable for any purpose to any person. We had a thousand million dollars tied up that was only available under conditions which would have had no application to this class of deposits. The depositor in a savings bank can not give bonds; he can not maintain litigation; he can not protect himself. You are going to draw from the people that much money, which, if they can find no other use than their own for it, would find its way into the channels of trade, and you are going to drive it away and lock it up. Subject to what? Subject to the lifted eyebrow of the cashier when he says, "We are not discounting to-day."

When one of these people needs money, perhaps to save his home, and he goes to the bank for it (it may be the bank in which his deposit has been placed by the Government), he will be refused. The Government is going to gather all this money of the helpless and place it in the banks, which can refuse to loan a dollar of it, or which can charge 1 per cent a month, or any other rate, or impose any other condition.

Suppose a man has deposited his $500. Suppose a man with a family of five available depositors has $2,500 in bank, and an opportunity offers for investment, either for comfort or necessity, and he goes to get his money. They say, "This account will have to be sent to Washington to be adjusted before we can say when we can pay it or how much you may get." "But," he says, "I want to use this money next Monday to save myself from the loss of my home," or "to buy a home." The bank says, "We can not help you; the rules and regulations are such that we must go through this machinery," and they wave him off with that air which all have witnessed. He says, "I will go down to the bank, and I can probably borrow the money from the bank until I can withdraw it from your institution." He goes to the bank which perhaps holds his deposit, and they coolly tell him, "We are not discounting to-day." They say, "Give us some collateral security." These bank books are not transferable under the proposed law. You do not intend to make them transferable. You do not intend to make them the basis for a loan. You do not intend to make them available to rescue a man in the distress of circumstances. You intend to get his money and build up a great grinding combination of rules and regulations until the people become desperate. And I tell you that in my judgment they will rise up when they realize what you have done, that you have placed them under a government of rules and regulations, and they will rise up and remind you that they are sovereign; and they have a method of enforcing their sovereignty that is known to most of us at some time in our lives.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he proposes to continue the further consideration of the bill to-day. It seems to be taking the usual course.

Mr. CARTER. In view of the fact that the Senator from Idaho desires to make some remarks on the bill, which I hope he will do after he has read it, we will not ask for a vote to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I might very properly suggest to the Senator from Montana at this time that before the final vote is taken upon this bill, or any other, the Senator from Idaho will exercise the privilege of discussing it according to his judgment, or lack of judgment, just whenever he sees fit.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. OWEN) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 162), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 162.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in Indian depredation cases, not heretofore reported, requiring an appropriation by Congress.

REPRESSION OF TRADE IN WHITE WOMEN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 214), which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In further response to the resolution of the Senate of December 7, 1909, requesting the President to inform the Senate, "if not incompatible with the public interest, as to what action, if any, has been taken, under the treaty ratified March 1, 1905, for the repression of the trade in white women, and what provision has been made for the carrying out of said treaty," I transmit herewith a report by the Commissioner-General of Immigration, who has been designated as the representative of this country under the said treaty, giving the information desired.

AFFAIRS IN PORTO RICO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I beg to transmit herewith a report made to me by the Secretary of War upon the conditions found by him to exist in the island of Porto Rico during a visit made at my request. The people of Porto Rico, if we may judge by the expressions of the political parties in the island, have been anxious to secure amendments to the so-called "Foraker law," and especially a declaration by Congress making those who are now Porto Rican citizens under the Foraker law American citizens.

I commend to Congress the consideration of the report of the Secretary of War, and recommend the adoption of his suggestions, which have been embodied in a bill amending the so-called "Foraker Act." This bill is at the disposition of Congress. The Secretary suggests not an act making all Porto Rican citizens American citizens, with or without their consent, but an act to provide machinery by which Porto Rican citizens who shall make the proper application for citizenship to a proper court shall become American citizens upon taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. After a certain date the right to vote and to hold office is to be confined to American citizens, and only those American citizens are to enjoy the franchise who can satisfy certain educational or property qualifications. At present there is manhood suffrage in the island, and as a very large percentage of the voters are unable to read or write the electorate is not one which should be intrusted with the government. It is much better, in the interests of the people of the island, that the suffrage should be limited by an educational and property qualification.

I do not comment on the other changes in the laws recommended by the Secretary, because he sufficiently discusses them, and his arguments need no addition from me.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1910.

[Report and other papers accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

INVESTIGATION OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT, ETC.

Mr. MONEY. I ask to have read a letter from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] which I have just received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Secretary will read the letter as requested by the Senator from Mississippi.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1910.

Hon. H. D. MONEY.

DEAR SIR: I have been confined to my bed by illness since Friday, and indications are that I may be for some days. I wish you would on Monday, when the Senate meets, announce my retirement from the investigation committee.

I feel that in justice to myself I should not continue to be a member of the committee. The labors of the committee will be burdensome. The investigation involves a careful study of the laws as to public lands, mineral privileges, etc. In addition to that, a wide range will be covered in the development of the facts relating to the subjects of investigation. Absence for several days from the meetings of the committee would make it difficult for me to give the investigation the kind of consideration which its importance demands.

Very truly, yours,

T. H. PAYNTER.

Mr. MONEY. At the request of the Senator from Kentucky, I ask that he be excused from further service on the joint committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Kentucky is excused.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 1, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 31, 1910.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"O Lord, our God and our Father, we thank Thee that, in spite of the alarmists, in spite of the ominous growls of the pessimists, knowledge is increasing, ignorance is passing away; that the good is in the ascendency, while evil is dying; that men are growing more and more into the likeness of their Maker; that the world is better to-day than it was yesterday. Help, we beseech Thee, to throw our influence on the side of right, truth, and justice, and eschew all evil, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in the earth as it is in heaven, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen."

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

A QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRONNA. I send to the Clerk's desk an article which appeared in the Forum, published at Fargo, N. Dak., January 26, 1910.

The Clerk read as follows:

TO OPEN NEW BUREAU.

[By Associated Press.]

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1910.

It is currently reported here that the Marshall-Gronna combination is about to open campaign headquarters in Washington. The Washington branch, it is said, will be conducted by Representative Gronna and a corps of workers. Washington offers great advantages to the combination, it is claimed, because of the franking privilege, which usually is worked overtime by candidates for office.

It is a question whether Representative GRONNA can legally frank campaign literature, now that his political interests lie in another direction. Certain it is that thousands of franked letters in support of the Lakota man's candidacy for the Senate are being sent to North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I should have paid no attention to this ridiculous article had it appeared only in the Forum, because the Forum is, as is quite well known, a sensational and boss-ruled paper. But, Mr. Speaker, the same article, which I have had read at the Clerk's desk, appeared in the Bismarck Tribune, purporting to be a dispatch from the Associated Press. The Tribune is not a sensational paper and is not so considered generally. On the other hand, it is rather a conservative paper. I consider its editor a friend of mine, a respected citizen, and an able writer. Observing that this story was credited to the Associated Press, I was curious to know how and where they obtained their information. I called up the office of the Associated Press and talked with Mr. John P. Gavit over the telephone, and at his request I called at his office later and he assured me that he believed this article was not sent out by them. I want to say, in justice to Mr. Gavit and to the Associated Press, that I was treated in the most courteous manner. After a thorough examination of the files of their office, Mr. Gavit gave me a letter which is as follows:

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Washington Bureau, January 30, 1910.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg leave to thank you for drawing my attention to the issue of the Bismarck (N. Dak.) Daily Tribune of January 27, 1910, containing the following, which purports to be a dispatch of the Associated Press:

"WASHINGTON, January 26.

"It is currently reported here that the Marshall-Gronna combination is about to open campaign headquarters in Washington. The Washington branch, it is said, will be conducted by Representative GRONNA and a corps of workers. Washington offers great advantages to the combination, it is claimed, because of the franking privilege, which usually is worked overtime by candidates for office.

"It is a question whether Representative GRONNA can legally frank campaign literature now that his political interests lie in another direction. Certain it is that thousands of franked letters in support of the Lakota man's candidacy for the Senate are being sent to North Dakota."

I believe I can safely assure you that this dispatch was not sent over the wires of the Associated Press anywhere, or otherwise handled by it. We do not transmit matter of this character; if for no other reason, that it is of purely local interest.

I can assure you without qualification that it never was sent by the Associated Press from Washington. I have carefully examined all of the files of "sent copy" for that date, and am absolutely certain that it was not handled on our wires. I should have been just as certain without any investigation whatever. I do not believe that it reached the Bismarck Tribune through the Associated Press at all. Of course I can venture no opinion as to the source from which it came to that paper.

I beg leave to say that I am forwarding a copy of this letter to our general headquarters at New York, and also to the superintendent of the central division of the Associated Press, Mr. H. L. Beach, at Chicago.

Yours, very truly, JOHN P. GAVIT.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to venture an opinion as to who sent this report, but I do say that I believe that whoever wrote it knew that he manufactured a lie out of whole cloth. The statement that I have sent out thousands of franked letters in the interest of my candidacy is false. I should not at this time, Mr. Speaker, take the time of this House were it not for the fact that I consider that it is a reflection upon the membership of this House as well as upon my own, and, furthermore, it reflects and does an injustice to a former colleague, an honored Member of this House, one who is held in the highest estimation by those who know him, the Hon. Thomas F. Marshall. [Applause.]

I do not want to be understood as having any objection to being criticised. I realize as much as anyone that the press has a right to criticise if done in a spirit of fairness, but I want to say that we should remember and the press should remember, as well as the members of this House, that, in the language of the great emancipator of this country, it should be done with malice to none and charity for all. [Applause.]

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL MESSAGE OF JANUARY 14, 1910.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means I present the following privileged report (No. 358), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 337.

Resolved, That so much of the special message of the President of the United States, transmitted to the two Houses of Congress January 14, 1910, as relates to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to the improvement of rivers and harbors be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

That so much as relates to agriculture and forestry be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

That so much as relates to the lands of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

That so much as relates to the irrigation of arid lands be referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the committee, and I ask that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I have not given that careful and considerate attention to the President's message which most of the Members of the House ordinarily do, but the committee of which I have the honor to be a member deals with certain phases of the water-power question. I do not know whether the President has covered that phase of that question in his message, but if so, it properly should be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. DWIGHT. Does the gentleman from Illinois want everything?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT] asks if we want everything. We want nothing, but there are certain things that properly go to that committee, with which it is now dealing, and if the President's message refers in any way to water power in navigable streams, or the construction of dams across navigable waters of the United States, then that is a matter which is now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, from glancing through this message hastily, I think I can assure the gentleman that this refers only to deep waterways. But, Mr. Speaker, I will turn the message of the President over to the gentleman from Illinois, and defer my request for the present while I take up another matter, and he can examine it for himself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, and also the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. Has either of these distinguished Republicans read this message?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I listened with very marked attention when the message was being read from the Clerk's desk at the time it was sent to the House, but at some point I was interrupted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] with a side conversation, and I may have missed that particular part of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is very unfortunate that the gentleman from New York interrupted the attention of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws his request temporarily.

BONDS AND CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report (No. 357) from the Committee on Ways and Means, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19548) prescribing certain provisions and conditions under which bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States may be issued, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That any bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States hereafter issued shall be payable, principal and interest, in United States gold coin of the present standard of value; and that such bonds may be issued in such denominations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That any certificates of indebtedness hereafter issued shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under state, municipal, or local authority; and that a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of any certificates of indebtedness issued is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this also comes with a unanimous report, and I also ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill and report be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object, but I think the gentleman ought to make some explanation of the bill in connection with the request.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The second section of the bill exempts from all taxes and duties certificates of indebtedness. The governor of the State of New York in a recent message to the legislature of that State opposed the adoption of the income-tax amendment and alleged as a reason for his attitude that it might subject government securities to taxation. I want to ask the gentleman from New York whether this is not true—that this bill exempts all certificates of indebtedness, and thus removes all those grounds of objection on the part of the governor.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this bill does exempt by its terms certificates of indebtedness as well as bonds of the Government. I do not think that any State could tax bonds of the Government, but a man who is loaning money is sometimes fearful lest he may have a lawsuit over it, and if we provide in a bill in express terms that these are exempted there will be no apprehension of that kind.

In explanation to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I want to say that the reason for the passage of this bill is twofold.

In the tariff act of last summer we provided for an issue of bonds in payment of the Panama Canal to the extent of the estimated cost of the canal. There was a provision on that subject, put on in the House, that went out in the Senate, which was taken up in the conference committee, and finally there was a draft of that section of the bill made in the Treasury Department. The committee adopted the draft substantially, and then received a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury calling attention to a manifest error made in the original draft. This letter was addressed to one of the Senate conferees, and the conferees unanimously decided that the amendment that the Secretary had recommended in his communication was a proper one; one of the conferees, not of the House, drew his lead pencil through the words that the Secretary had asked to be stricken out, but carelessly also drew the pencil through two more words in the bill that provided that the principal of those bonds should be payable in gold, so that the act as it now reads provides that the interest on those bonds shall be paid in gold, but makes no legislative direction as to the payment of the principal. This bill attempts to cure that defect in this second section. The part in regard to certificates has already been sufficiently explained in my reply to the gentleman from New York, my colleague. Now, there is another suggestion in the bill. That act provides for the issue of bonds in denominations of one hundred, five hundred, and one thousand dollars. Those bonds, of course, were acceptable to the man who buys coupon bonds, but the man or bank which takes registered bonds desires to have them in a larger denomination. If they borrowed a hundred thousand dollars, say, a hundred thousand dollars of bonds would make a large bulk to put away in a vault, and the bonds sell more readily in denominations commensurate with the size of the loan which the bank makes to the Government. Heretofore in bills of this kind generally it has been left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the size of the bond, and it is amended by this bill to conform to the practice hitherto and also the legislation up to the time of the Spanish war loan on this subject, and allows the denomination to be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. I think those are the only changes made in this bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no change in the rate of interest on the Panama Canal bonds in any way at all?

Mr. PAYNE. Not at all; nor in the tax when the bonds are used for circulation.

Mr. MANN. Are these certificates of indebtedness now exempt from taxation?

Mr. PAYNE. I think that is so under the Spanish war-loan act, but these certificates are provided for in the bill of last summer. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish the gentleman would yield me five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill is not before the House yet. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the second attempt to perfect the so-called "Payne tariff act." The first attempt was made before it became a law. A joint resolution was passed to amend the shoe schedule so that the promises made in regard to shoes would be kept. Now, it seems that the Payne tariff bill was prepared in such a careless, indifferent, and incapable manner that no provision was made for the money in which the bonds which were provided in the bill to be issued were to be paid, but particular care was taken that the interest at least should be paid in gold coin.

I have not had an opportunity yet to go through the law as carefully as I desire for the purpose of making certain comparisons, but I have no doubt that the action of the gentleman from New York to-day will be repeated frequently at this session of Congress, and from time to time unanimous consent will be asked to permit the passage of bills to correct notorious defects in the Payne tariff act, which this side of the House will be happy to join in passing. More than that, Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that by the time we begin to make a careful overhauling of the Payne tariff act many, many amendments and changes can be made in it with resulting benefit to the public. Another Member of the House from New York, a Republican, has announced that he will introduce a joint resolution to-day suspending the tariff on all meats for one year, so that people may be relieved from the exorbitant prices now being charged for meat in this country. I know that a distinguished Republican in a speech the other day stated that he, at some other time, would take up this question of prices and would demonstrate that the tariff had nothing whatever to do with the prices of food products; and yet another Member, a colleague of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, is so little impressed by that argument and has so little confidence in the assertion of the distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means to whom I refer that he believes that the effective method to bring relief to the people is to suspend the tariff on meats for one year.

This bill is to be introduced by the gentleman from Brooklyn [Mr. FOELKER], who represents the Fourth New York District, if I be not mistaken, and it will provide that for one year the tariff on meat supplies, including beef, mutton, lamb, pork, and other meats intended for use as human food, shall be suspended for one year.

I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if he will not at this time accept an amendment to the pending bill, designed to cure defects in the law for the interest of the bondholders, which will bring some relief to the consumers of the country by suspending the tariff on meat products intended for use as food for one year. If there be such solicitude to bring relief to those who are able to purchase bonds of the United States, why not give some relief to the great mass of the people who are now suffering under Republican laws and a Republican administration? Why not do a little for the hungry and the poor? Why not take effective steps to rebuke the outrageous action of the beef trust in keeping up the price of meats, and give some relief to those unable to purchase bonds, but anxious and willing to purchase food for themselves and their families? There will be no opposition on this side, and, as the suggestion comes from a Republican colleague of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I know that he will not charge that it is instigated by politics merely, but will realize that it is done purely for the relief of the masses. I hope he will now see how effective such an amendment will be and will consent that it be offered at this time, and in that way perfect a little more the law which bears his distinguished name. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in the remarks just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], but there is hardly a hope that his proposition can affect the minds and consciences of the other side, though doubtless it may penetrate their understanding, so I will address my remarks to other matters.

I read a short article contributed to the "Town-Talk" column in the Enquirer-Sun, of Columbus, Ga., which I think was written by Mr. Woodall, a very talented young man connected with the staff of that paper:

The annual deficit has occurred in the Postal Department, and the annual "miration" is being made over it. The causes of the excess of expenses over revenue are being analyzed and solemnly discussed, and no doubt the usual heavy editorials telling how to reform the Post-Office Department are in course of preparation.

It is rather singular that the annual "deficit" in the War Department and the Navy Department and the Pension Department, and various and divers other departments of the Government seldom excite attention and very rarely provoke comment. But the Postal Department, just because it is making an honest effort to foot its own bills and make its way along in the world without help, is always in the limelight when it's a few millions to the bad.

Come to think about it, the Postal Department is about the only department in the whole scheme of government that is even partially self-sustaining. "War and its rewards," as the army, navy, and pension branches are termed, get mammoth appropriations, with never a thought on the part of Congress of getting a cent of it back; that is, directly. Getting right down to the facts in the case, it is probable that the people as a whole, you and I and our neighbor and friend out on the rural free-delivery route, get more solid benefit and comfort out of the delivery of mails by the Government, promptly and accurately, than from any other expenditure made by Uncle Sam.

The United States mail is a practical blessing that enters into the lives of all the people. It is true that the Government charges for stamps and does not haul anything free except pieces of mail (and express) that travel in style and in state under official franks. At the same time this revenue is not sufficient to pay expenses. The deficit this year was $17,000,000, if the writer's memory be not at fault. And when Uncle Sam paid this $17,000,000 he had the satisfaction of knowing that the money had done more real good and had benefited the people as a whole in a more practical way more than all the hundreds of millions expended on Dreadnoughts and armor plates.

* * * * * * *

Analysis of the deficit shows that the two main causes of the loss in handling the mails are the transmission of second-class matter (publications) and the rural free delivery routes. The people at large are benefited by the circulation of newspapers and magazines at low rates of postage, and as for rural free delivery, everybody knows what a blessing that is proving. Uncle Sam is now expending some $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 a year carrying the farmer his morning mail; but everybody will agree that the money is not wasted. Country life is thereby made more attractive, the value of farm lands is enhanced, and the standard of comfort of the rural population is advanced.

I also wish to read the following, clipped from some paper, but contributed by a Georgia correspondent:

A Georgia correspondent, discussing the postal deficit, says: "It seems to me that the Post-Office Department gives more real service to more people than all other branches of the Government combined and also brings in greater returns in dollars and cents. Therefore, I see no reason why it should be censured for not being self-supporting when other branches are a total expense." And what foolishness the talk about a department of the Government being self-supporting is, anyway! If it is self-supporting, it is so because the people are paying enough to make it so; and if it is not self-supporting, the people make up the deficit. There is, in the case of the Post-Office Department, a certain amount of money required for operating expenses. What difference does it make in the end whether the people pay this bill by buying postage stamps or in the settlement of some other tax? It is a matter of taxation, and the only question involved is as to the form that the tax shall take.

Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that some people are too strenuous in demanding an annual profit at the hands of the Post-Office Department. The danger is that enforced economy might impair efficiency and curtail usefulness. The Government itself was not created as a money-making institution. Its purposes are decidedly higher and nobler. In order to carry out those purposes it was necessary to provide revenues, to meet the expenses of administering the Government. The Treasury Department was established and charged with the duty of looking out for the financial necessities of the Government. In the House a Committee on Ways and Means was charged with the duty of providing ways and means to enable the Treasury Department to raise the necessary money. The War Department and the Navy Department were established in order to take care of the public defense. The Interior Department was established for necessary internal administration to protect the property interests of the Government and care for, rather than acquire, assets for the Government. To it was committed the distribution, rather than the accumulation, of large sums of money, notable among which is the pension fund.

The State Department was created not as a money-maker for the Government, but to conduct our intercourse with other governments, and in the business of diplomacy disbursement is much more common than accumulation. Likewise, the Department of Agriculture is charged with promoting interests of very great concern to the body of our population and the dispensing of information as to the agricultural enterprise and progress of the country. The Department of Commerce and Labor has been thought necessary to regulate and protect our great and growing commercial and labor interests. The Department of Justice was certainly not intended as a money-making institution. It was created as a necessary instrumentality to enforce the law. The Post-Office Department was intended purely and simply as a public convenience. In fact, its first conception was as an aid to official intercourse, official communication, and the discharge of official duties. How strange that now some unreasoning and unthinking people carp and criticise its continued and extended use for that purpose.

Every few days we read of some assault upon the use of the franking privilege by Congressmen and officials, as though it were a privilege personal to them and used solely for their personal emolument and convenience. That is a radical and fundamental error. There may be occasional abuses, whether originating in ignorance, carelessness, or design; but the abuses are infinitesimal in number and amount involved compared to the bulk of that character of mail which consists simply in sending to the people the things which belong to the people and which ought to be delivered to the people. The matters of seeds and documents, of which some cheeseparing patriots make such a bugaboo, ought to be clearly understood by everybody. The Government prints many documents, some of which I sometimes think of little value, but those very ones may be of greatest value to the people of some other section. I often think that of the best books the issues printed are too small, that larger allotments ought to be made of the most valuable books and smaller allotments of the less valuable books; but those are matters of judgment that I am not allowed to control.

The purpose, however, of disseminating among the people the valuable information which the Government with its powerful agencies is able to acquire on various subjects is certainly a wise one, and in distributing those documents to his constituents the Congressman performs a part of his routine duty and should be credited with that much diligence in the discharge of his duty, instead of being reviled as acting entirely from political motive and charged with the expense of paying postage on the public documents which belong to the people to whom they are sent. Likewise the seed distribution is founded in a good purpose. The discovery and exchange of new and rare varieties of seed is entirely laudable to enable the people of the various regions of the country to experiment, introduce, and improve seeds in order to find those best adapted most productive and profitable. That purpose is not always executed nor realized in perfection. Many seeds are purchased and sent to people who do not need them, to whom they are not new, rare, nor desirable. Nevertheless, the fact remains that people all over the country do wish the benefit of the Government's knowledge and agencies in improving their varieties of seeds. It may be a small practice in the eyes of some people for a Congressman to send them out, but the practice of deriding and criticising him for it is a great deal smaller when the facts are known.

The department, I believe, does its best under the appropriations made to carry out the plan. They make mistakes, and Congressmen send to their constituents packages made up and furnished by the department. Those packages often contain varieties of seed not desired by the recipient at all, while some other seed sent to other parts of the country would have been much more satisfactory. The Congressman is often erroneously blamed for that. He simply performs a part of his routine duties. They belong to the people, the people want them, it is his duty to have them distributed, and a great many people appreciate them, far more than the small number of scoffers who criticize, usually from an ulterior and sinister motive, profess to believe. The two arguments usually made against it are trifling, selfish, and erroneous. Some people who wish for other purposes the small amount of money devoted to that purpose object to it as waste and graft, failing to mention the fact that other smaller and more highly favored classes are the beneficiaries of governmental favor in hundreds of times that much. Another class object—and a powerful lobby has been used to advocate the objection—that it interferes with the business of the seedsmen. That is untrue. When undesirable seed go into a community they are generally discarded, but whether used or not they certainly would not, in any event, have been purchased from local seedsmen. If they are good seed, there are not enough of them to answer the purpose.

They only suggest their usefulness to the recipient and at once create a demand for a great many more like them, and in nine cases out of ten the recipient goes to the seedsman and buys many more in order to plant enough, when he would have bought none had the matter not been suggested by his receiving an insufficient quantity of desirable seed. In my judgment, the effect of the seed distribution is rather to stimulate the seed business than to damage it. At any rate a Congressman would be in small and contemptible business to decline to distribute them to his people or transfer them to some other people than his own if his own is not an agricultural district. In my judgment, it would be much smaller and more inexcusable for a Congressman to vote to discontinue the practice on account of any adverse arguments or ridicule. The order of the Postmaster-General prohibiting free transportation in the mails of seed franks, while transmitting the franks and the seeds both, after the franks are attached to the package, may be law, or at least it may be argued to be law, but it is too small a matter for so big an argument.

In my judgment, it could have been easily argued and determined the other way, and it has been so done under previous administrations. If it is the law it ought to be amended at once, not because it is big enough to be of much importance, but because it is too little to justify any such exhibition. The other duties of the Post-Office Department are all confined in the main to distributing and exchanging communications and literature. I do not care to discuss in detail the persistent effort to raise the price on magazines and periodicals, referred to in a lump as second-class mail matter. The chief and prime purpose, of course, is to transmit and exchange letters, but in a liberty-loving country whose institutions are dependent on intelligence, those instrumentalities of instruction and education, so highly beneficial to the people, should receive liberal treatment in transmission. There is no objection to reasonable regulations and some pay as to all but official mail, but it has wisely been the practice to allow such mail to go cheaper because it was of general benefit to the people.

As to the second-class matter, it might be profitable to consider the terms on which the Government contracts with the railroads with a view to business principles, bearing in mind the conditions of competition by those same railroads directly or indirectly through the express companies. I merely call attention to the fact, which appears to be known to everybody, that the evident loss to the Government on long-distance shipments of second-class mail from the difference between the price paid the railroad and the postage received would be more than made up by profits on the short-distance shipments if the department received that business at all. But while the express companies can not compete with the Government at the uniform rate charged by the department for long distances, they can very easily underbid that same uniform rate on short distances, take all the business, and make lots of money. Instead of being stampeded by the foolish notion that the department must be self-sustaining, and that the accommodation of the people in the use of this second-class mail matter must be curtailed, why not look to the proposition of adjusting the rates to the distances, and so trading with the railroads as to secure some of the short and profitable business as well as the long and unprofitable hauls? A private shipper would be too smart to do business with the railroads under an arrangement which permitted that railroad to allow a competitor to take all the profitable business.

The most valuable branch of the entire department is the rural delivery, which, under the splendid management of Mr. De Graw and Mr. Spillman, two of the best business men I ever saw, is doing all the good possible to be accomplished with the money appropriated for the purpose. In my judgment those two vigilant public servants do their best to make the service satisfactory and efficient; and I believe that, with the money at their command, they give to the rural population all advantage possible. There are some cases where the roads are so laid out that routes can not be made of exactly standard length. The inspector may reach a fork in the roads or a crossroad, by turning at which he would make a route 23¾ miles. Under the present arrangement the carrier could only be paid for riding 22 miles, because the unit of gradation is 2 miles, fractions being not allowed nor single miles. Beyond that crossroad there are a number of families not accessible to any other route at all, and by going 4 miles farther roads could be found to go around and serve them all; yet the carrier would have to travel 27¾ miles, or 3¾ miles for which he would receive no pay. There are many routes of various lengths along which good people live at a distance of from one-half mile to 2 miles. These people can not be reached by any other route. They can not be served unless accommodated by that one. If the Division of Rural Free Delivery were allowed sufficient money and the present unit of gradation reduced from 2 miles to half a mile, so that every carrier could be paid approximately for the distance he travels, the Division of Rural Free Delivery could substantially equalize all these routes and serve everybody. Where it is necessary or desirable a carrier would not object to having his route extended 3 or 4 miles if his pay was increased according to the extension. On the other hand, if the circumstances did not permit a full standard route, a carrier ought not to lose the pay for 2 miles when his route is short only a quarter of a mile. Yet such is the case at present. The pay of the carriers is not sufficient nor in fair relation to that paid the city carriers. The very service the rural carriers are engaged in scatters information which equalizes the price of supplies, so that the initial cost is about as great in one place as in another.

The rural service keeps everybody posted as to prices and all other events. The day is passed when you can dash out into the country and pick up a lot of country produce at less than it is worth, because everybody everywhere now knows its value. Of course the profits of the middlemen cut a figure a great deal larger than they should cut, but not sufficient to justify the difference in salaries in the city and in the country. Furthermore, in addition to the hardships and privations of a long drive every day in all sorts of weather, so arduous as to disqualify the carrier from doing anything else if he had time, his expense of equipment and maintenance consume about one-half of his annual salary, a larger proportion than is known in any other business. In fact, about $37.50 per month is all of the salary left, out of which the carrier must support his family, educate his children, and lay up a competency for his old age.

It is hardly necessary to refer to the suggestion sometimes made by people, due, no doubt, to lack of investigation and consideration, rather than bad motive, that the country people now served by rural delivery should, in lieu thereof, be served by carriers who bid off the job by contract. To those who understand conditions over the country this idea is preposterous, if not monstrous. It would take away all consideration of character and decency and leave alone the question of how little money the cheapest and sorriest and most objectionable character would charge to do the physical work. The details of the possibilities are too tedious and dirty to be discussed. The present rural carrier is an officer of the Government, qualified by examination, oath, and bond from among the very best people in the community; the department will permit no other kind; the patrons will tolerate no other kind. His duties are a part of the post-office duties. You might just as well let out by contract the office of postmaster. The adoption of that idea as to carriers would speedily and utterly destroy the service. When school children and drummers and travelers did not deliver and dispatch the mail the people would revert to the old practice of going to town for their mail. But I dismiss that proposition, because I have too much faith in the committee and in Congress to apprehend any danger of its adoption.

My deep interest in the subject and my intimate acquaintance therewith have betrayed me into a longer discussion of details than I intended to make. What I started out to do was to call attention to the fundamental error sometimes influencing committeemen and Members of Congress—advocated in various quarters for various purposes, and sometimes wrongfully countenanced by the administration—that the Post-Office Department is expected to make money, that the people must be deprived of service because there is a deficit. Suppose there is. Use the money-raising arm of the Government and meet the deficit. A gentleman conducts a business for the support of his family. He sends his children to school and buys his wife a carriage and supplies her with dresses and jewelry and all manner of adornments and luxuries. The financial balance of his children in school would show a considerable deficit. As a financial venture the conveniences and luxury furnished to his wife show an entire deficit, but if the old gentleman's business is profitable he would easily meet those amounts, and it is just as reasonable for him to raise a domestic hue and cry about the luxuries and comforts in his family and the education and refinement of his children not making present financial profit as for people to demand that the Post-Office Department make money for the Government or even be self-sustaining. I admit that a wise economy ought to be used—that is, all the money spent ought to be so spent as to benefit the people with mail service.

No stealing ought to be allowed, but the officials of the Post-Office Department should understand that they are to spend all the money appropriated to supply the people with the best, promptest, most frequent and efficient service possible, and the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads ought to see all the money necessary for that purpose should be appropriated. There should be nothing niggardly or stingy in that department—none of the false economy which would deprive American citizens of mail service in order to save a dollar. Efficient service is the prime purpose and consideration, and should be secured honestly—that is, without stealage—and as economically as is consistent with good service. I do not believe it is even necessary to require that first-class business shall be self-sustaining, much less pay for alleged shortage on other business. One cent postage is sufficient for letters. In my judgment, if Congress would make sufficient appropriations and give proper direction for the administration of the Post-Office Department according to these suggestions, we would have an efficient service, satisfactory to the people, and if satisfactory to them, profitable to them. Turning money into the Treasury is not the only way or always the best way to insure profit to the people. Service is what they want in the Post-Office Department, not money.

A prosperous and contented people can be relied upon to supply the Treasury with necessary money, and I regret that there seems to be a dislocation of ideas and misconstruction of the duties allotted to various committees. Members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are tearing their hair and racking their brain and working themselves into a frenzy of excitement trying to help raise money to run the Government to wipe out a deficit instead of performing their legitimate functions of appropriating all the money necessary and possible and searching out and authorizing every available way in which the Post-Office Department can wisely expend money for the service of the people. On the other hand, the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, whose duty it is to raise money for the Treasury, devote their energies to curtailing the receipts at the customs-houses, and instead of raising money by collecting taxes at the ports, are giving their attention to building up particular interests and enriching particular classes by the direct power and intervention of the Government. If that great committee would only reduce to the competitive point a few of the duties on the most common articles of general use in this country, the Treasury would overflow with money and we would never again hear of this nonsense about a deficit in the operation of the Post-Office Department, intended not to make money but to spend it for the benefit of the people.

A good deal has been said about amending the rules and the method of making up the committees of the House. Whatever the method may be, it would be better for the country if those members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads who imagine it is incumbent on them to provide money to support the Government were transferred to the Committee on Ways and Means. Those members of the Ways and Means Committee who, instead of providing an honest and fair system of taxation to fill the Treasury with money while preserving fair conditions for people to live under, are devoting their great talents to producing inequalities, exempting lines of business from taxation and competition, and building up and enriching special classes, should in turn be transferred to some other committee; or, better still, the people, by wisely changing the political complexion of this House, could transfer the control of all those committees to good Democrats, who understand the genius of our institutions, the principles and system of our Government, and would see that it was conducted for the benefit of the people and the glory of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. PAYNE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is reported unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means, the minority on the committee being in a position where they could not refuse to help the majority in taking care of the affairs of the Government. It is to be regretted exceedingly that within six months, and less than six months, after we pass a great revenue bill to take care of the finances of the country we are brought face to face with the problem of issuing bonds to prevent a deficit in the Treasury, but as it seems the administration desires to have these bonds or certificates of indebtedness so issued that they are salable in the country, and that the Government may proceed to carry on its governmental functions and have sufficient money to do so, notwithstanding the failure of the tariff legislation to produce sufficient revenue to run the Government, we feel it is nothing but right we should aid as far as possible the administration to obtain money to run the Government if their financial bills are not capable of raising the funds that the Government requires.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood this was a unanimous report. I notice it provides for the issuance of bonds to be payable in gold coin.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will come to that in a minute. I am sure my voice sounds pleasant to the gentleman along the lines on which I am discussing this bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's voice always sounds pleasant, and will sound much more pleasant when he is defending an issue of bonds payable in gold coin from that side of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We regret that in the hurried way in which the Payne tariff bill was passed, without the minority having a chance to participate on the conference committee, these mistakes and irregularities should have crept into the bill. But notwithstanding that fact they are here. It has been the custom of this Government whenever it sold bonds to exempt them from taxation. Whether that custom is a good one or a bad one is a question, but these certificates of indebtedness can not be sold without that provision is included in this bill. Therefore I feel that we should not stand in the way of selling these certificates of indebtedness if the Government is in need of the money at this time.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Do you not think it would be better policy for the party in power, instead of borrowing money to pay the operating expenses of the Government, to reduce the tariff so that it would produce revenue and make cheaper commodities in the necessaries of life? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably.

Mr. CULLOP. Then I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But we can not shape the policy of the majority of this House. We are in hopes the day will come when we can shape a policy of our own.

Mr. CULLOP. Can not we refuse to let them keep on plundering the people by the Payne tariff bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we refuse to supply the money to cover their mistake we embarrass the Government and the people of the United States very seriously. I do not think that is a proper way to handle the question. I believe that within the next year the people may in their wisdom determine to write a tariff bill that will raise sufficient revenue to support the Government, and then these certificates of indebtedness will be withdrawn.

Now, as to what the gentleman from Illinois says in reference to making these Panama bonds payable in gold. That question was fought out a number of years ago. About the only piece of legislation that the Republican party has put upon the statute books within the last sixteen years that it has been in power so far as it related to the financial question and was effective and amounted to anything was a bill that they passed many years ago providing that all indebtedness of the United States should be paid in gold.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. What is the use of doing it again?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because you have established a precedent and we can not get away from it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have no apology to make for bringing in this bill to make these changes six months after the passage of the tariff bill. On the last tariff bill ever enacted by the Democratic party, known as the "Wilson-Gorman Act," within six minutes, not within six months, after the Senate amendments had been adopted by the House, gentlemen on the other side began to introduce bill after bill to amend that tariff bill, the creation of the highest wisdom of a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House, and have never made any apologies for doing that. That was the last tariff bill that they ever enacted and probably the last tariff bill they ever will enact in this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, this bill provides for the payment of these bonds in gold. Why? For the benefit of the rich bondholder, according to the talk of my colleague? An adjective beginning with "d" might properly describe that kind of talk. For the benefit of those people who buy the bonds, that they may give more money for them, and pay more money into the Treasury, and so contribute relief to the taxpayers of this country! That is the object of the bill.

The gentleman asks if I will accept an amendment putting all meat products on the free list. The gentleman knows that if I should accept such an amendment as that it would open up the whole tariff question in this House, and any amendment changing any rate of duty in any tariff schedule would be in order, and that we would get into the attitude of a revision of the tariff. Business that has gone upward with leaps and bounds since this tariff bill was signed by the President would again be paralyzed. Why? As a matter of course they would wait to see what we were going to do on the question of the schedules in the tariff revision. A thousand times, no, I would say, against any such opening up of this question at the present time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact that unanimous consent was given for the consideration of the bill in the House, instead of in Committee of the Whole House, is an answer to the gentleman's contention that it would open up the entire tariff schedule. He has absolute control of the situation and could demand the previous question at any time.

Mr. PAYNE. But what would they do in the Senate, where there is no previous question, if that were done?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There would be no danger in the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE. Let us be frank. Naturally that would open up the whole proposition in the Senate, and the gentleman's suggestion is utterly impracticable.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman would have thorough control.

Mr. PAYNE. It is not for this House that the gentleman's remarks were made. They were made for the purpose of getting something into the newspapers that would help out the poor Democratic party. That was the reason of the gentleman's remarks. Of course, they were not made in good faith. Of course, the gentleman knows——

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were made in good faith.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman knows what the rules of the Senate are, where there is no previous question, and he knows what the rules of the House are.

He knows that it requires a majority for the previous question, to bottle it up even in the House. I suppose we would control it undoubtedly, and yet there may be some gentlemen in the House who, if meats were on the free list, would desire to have some other things on the free list. And if I allowed the amendment, how does he know that the same gentlemen on his side who so cheerfully voted against putting hides on the free list would vote to-day to put meats and cattle and all that sort of thing on the free list?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why do you not give us a chance?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman attempts to speak for his side of the House; and now, when I call attention to the fact that he can not speak for them, and when I call up history not six months old, then he wants to know why I do not give him a chance. I refer it to the next Democratic caucus; and that caucus, knowing that the question will not come before them at this session of Congress, will probably resolve that they will keep hides on the free list, and that they will put meats on the free list, and they will stick to it until after the next election; but if they had a chance to revise the tariff, a majority of them would stand where they stood last August and last July, in favor of a revenue duty on hides that is just exactly equal to the protective duty on hides that was put on by the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go into a tariff discussion at this time. I may at a later date. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the bill to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL MESSAGE OF JANUARY 14.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent to take up the resolution (H. Res. 337) distributing the President's special message of January 14, 1910, and consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdrew the resolution. Does the gentleman again report it?

Mr. PAYNE. I reported it before. I only withdrew my request for unanimous consent to consider it in the House.

The SPEAKER. It was withdrawn, and the bill that was just disposed of was reported. It occurs to the Chair that the gentleman ought to report it again.

Mr. PAYNE. I again report it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman again reports House resolution 337 and asks unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the reading of the resolution will be dispensed with, as it has been read once.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. PAYNE. Five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits that the resolution being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House should be read under the five-minute rule at once. So the Clerk will proceed with the reading of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 337.

Resolved, That so much of the special message of the President of the United States, transmitted to the two Houses of Congress January 14, 1910, as relates to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to the improvement of rivers and harbors be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

That so much as relates to agriculture and forestry be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

That so much as relates to the lands of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

That so much as relates to the irrigation of arid lands be referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of submitting an observation.

In the President's message, and in the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, to be read in connection with the President's message, is the recommendation that the power sites on the public domain now temporarily withdrawn from entry by executive order shall be withdrawn by act of Congress until there be some disposition by Congress as to the terms upon which power sites may be acquired or used by individuals or private parties.

In the resolution now under consideration, that portion of the President's message is referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. If we may judge from expressions of opinion already made on the floor of the House by the chairman of that committee and other members of that committee, the members of that committee are not in sympathy with the views of the President upon that point.

I wish to say now that if the Committee on Public Lands shall take possession of any bill upon that subject and endeavor to file it away so that this House shall not have an opportunity to vote upon the question as to the withdrawal of these power sites from public entry under existing law, I, with others of this House, will endeavor to find a way under the rules of bringing the matter before the House. [Applause.] I hope the Committee on Public Lands will understand that and deal fairly with the House upon the subject.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman advise the House when a bill of that character was introduced how long it has been in possession of the Committee on Public Lands, and then will he advise the House when the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois concerning the damming of streams was referred to his committee and when it was reported back to the House? I would like to have the first question answered first.

Mr. MANN. I am not a member of the Committee on Public Lands——

Mr. SMITH of California. And has such a bill been introduced into the House at all?

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman a further question?

Mr. SMITH of California. I ask, Has such a bill been introduced in the House at all?

Mr. MANN. Is that the end of the question?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman. I am not a member of the Committee on Public Lands. I do not know whether such a bill has been introduced. In the message of the President he stated:

These recommendations are incorporated in bills he—has prepared, and they are at the disposition of the Congress.

The Secretary of the Interior—

Ordinarily, with that language in the President's message, some member of the committee to which the bill will be referred introduces a bill. I suspect that there is no member of the Committee on Public Lands even willing to introduce a bill, and for that reason I have made the statement that if that committee refuses to introduce a bill, or if when some Member of the House introduces such a bill, as will undoubtedly be the case, the members of the committee refuse to report, and the committee attempts to file the bill away, I will endeavor to find a way to present the matter before the House for a vote under the existing rule.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman from Illinois answer another question?

Mr. MANN. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. SMITH of California. Has not the gentleman himself introduced in this Congress a bill covering that entire subject, had it referred to his own committee, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and upon which there has been no report from his committee? What is the virtue of reading a lecture to the Committee on Public Lands concerning a report that he desires when he himself is the author of a bill covering the identical subject that is pending in his own committee and which does not seem to be in any hurry to report to the House?

Mr. MANN. I did not read a lecture to the Committee on Public Lands. Quite the contrary. I have great regard for the Committee on Public Lands. There is pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill which I introduced, which, in a way, covers this question, or, in my opinion, is a sufficient peg upon which to hang a bill which will cover the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Speaker, I was unfortunate in not hearing what the gentleman from Illinois had to say in regard to the action, or failure to act, of the Committee on the Public Lands touching certain bills or certain recommendations contained in the President's message. What I did hear of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois consisted of a brief but emphatic lecture to the Committee on the Public Lands for not having reported certain bills in a certain form agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he heard nothing of that kind from me. I made no reference to bills before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. MONDELL. I certainly heard the gentleman's threat that he would find some way to have these matters presented to the House, and that carried with it a criticism of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there were certain bills prepared in a certain place the object of which, it was stated, was to carry out certain recommendations in the President's message. I am glad to have an opportunity now of stating my action, or failure to act, touching those measures. They were handed to me with the request that if I agreed either in principle or in form with the propositions therein set out I might introduce them. Unfortunately for me, perhaps, I was not in harmony with the propositions contained in a number of the bills, and as to those with which I was in harmony I felt I could not support them in the form in which they were presented. To have introduced these bills, Mr. Speaker, would have been not only to put myself in a false light, but would have been to put those who drew them and those who stood sponsor for them in a false light.

In my fourteen years in this House I have never introduced a bill that I have not myself drawn, with the exception of a very few bills which I have introduced as chairman of the Public Lands Committee, having to do with purely administrative matters. I feel that when I introduce a bill into this House and place my name upon it I take full responsibility, not only for every proposition or suggestion of legislation contained in it, but for the form in which it is proposed to carry those things into effect, and therefore, so long as I am a Member of this body, I must respectfully decline to introduce any bill which does not meet with my approval either as to its purpose or as to its form.

I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that there was no misunderstanding, no unpleasantness in the matter of the introduction of these bills at all. There was a suggestion made, and to that I made a suggestion as to what, in my opinion, I could properly do—introduce them by request. It was not deemed proper to have them introduced in that way, and therefore the incident was closed so far as I was concerned.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Public Lands has never been derelict in its duty to this House or to the country. It is not now in the position of being derelict to its duty. It has been in session two and three days a week since the beginning of this Congress. It has taken up a number of matters relating to so-called "conservation." By direction of that committee I shall to-day report to the House a bill which the committee has given exceedingly careful consideration, touching some matters of importance relative to the public domain.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like the gentleman to yield to me for a question——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS (continuing). As I think this is of enough importance to the country and to the House for us to know where we stand.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield for a speech, but I yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I understand the gentleman, he is not personally in favor——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield for a speech in the five minutes time that I have.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not going to make a speech, but I am going to ask a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Then let the gentleman ask it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have to ask the question in my own way. I simply say this to the gentleman: That if it be true, then, that he is personally opposed to some of the recommendations of the President which it is proposed to have embodied in the bills he refers to, and if he personally declines to introduce a bill unless he personally favors it, what position is the House in as between the Committee on Public Lands, of which he is the chairman, and these bills which the House may want to pass?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think it scarcely necessary to answer whatever there may be of question included in the gentleman's remarks. Every Member of this House knows that we are all privileged to introduce any bill that we see fit at any time.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] can introduce the bills in question at any moment; could have introduced them at any moment since they were prepared. There is no difficulty about having the matters presented to the House. If these bills never were presented to the House and never were taken up by the committee in the form in which they are drawn, every proposition contained in them will be discussed by that committee, as practically every proposition contained in them has time and again, at length and in detail and with earnestness, been considered by that committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the idea that that committee has not carefully considered the needs and conditions of the public domain is an error, and a grievous error. That committee has been one of the busy committees of the House, and if its recommendations have not in all cases met with the approval of all the gentlemen, neither have the recommendations of other committees met with the approval of all of the gentlemen in the House. Mr. Speaker, all these matters will in due course and with promptness and earnestness, and with due deference to the opinions of the President and of every man whose opinion is entitled to deference, be carefully considered, and when the committee acts it will act not on the spur of any threat, but upon its calm, reasonable, and deliberate judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my time has expired.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming has yielded the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to move the previous question.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer an amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois entertained.

Mr. MANN. It was with no thought of making a threat that I made the remarks I did. The matter is before the House. The gentleman who has just addressed the House seems to forget that this matter is now before the House. Here is a proposition to refer to a committee the proposition of the President. The House now has it within its control not to send this matter to the Committee on Public Lands at all. It has it within its power to send it to any other committee, and in considering the question as to what committee the matter should be sent we have the right to understand something in regard to what attitude that committee will take. The bill to which the President refers have not yet been introduced. I have no criticism in reference to that matter at all. If I were the gentleman from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, maintaining the views which he has, I, like him, should have refused to have introduced the bills except on request, as he did; but it must be understood the Public Lands Committee is largely and properly made up of gentlemen from public lands States interested in the public lands at home.

Most of the questions which come before that committee relate to special things in reference to the public lands of local interest, but here are some questions in which the entire country is interested, where I believe a great majority of this House are upon one side and where I am inclined to think the chances are the members of the Committee on Public Lands are on the other side. I make no threat, but I say again if it shall be the effort or the policy, whether from motives of reason or otherwise, that these bills shall be pocketed in the Public Lands Committee in order that the House shall have no opportunity to vote upon them, then the House, in my opinion, will be presented with an opportunity. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAYNE. I will say, Mr. Speaker, I can not see the use of prolonging this debate; I can not see that it answers any useful purpose, and I can not yield to every member on that committee.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, coupling with the request that at the end of his five minutes the previous question may be considered as ordered, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota may occupy five minutes, and that at the end of the five minutes the previous question may be considered as ordered on the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Coupled with the request, I object.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. JAMES), the House divided and there were—ayes 147, noes 84.

So the previous question was ordered.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911; Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers have been demanded. Those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think, perhaps, it might be well for me to make a brief statement, so that Members who were not here on Saturday afternoon will understand the situation, and if I may have unanimous consent to do so——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is only in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in order to avoid the necessity of a statement I ask unanimous consent that we may have a small amount of debate. There are a number of gentlemen here who were not here on Saturday, and do not know what the proposition is or know about the merits of it, and I suggest to the Chairman that it would be entirely proper for us to have a few minutes of debate before we take the vote by tellers.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in view of the action of the committee on Saturday, and in view also of the fact it is well known that in the event the pending amendment fails other amendments will be introduced upon which debate will be permitted, I do not believe it will be proper to extend the time on this amendment, and I therefore feel obliged to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee closed debate on this amendment on Saturday. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture demanded tellers, and pending the demand he moved that the committee rise. The first thing in order this morning is, Shall the vote be taken by tellers?

The question was taken, and tellers were ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 18, line 17, after the word "weevil," all of said line and all of line 18 and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DICKSON] will take their places as tellers.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—yeas 88, nays 115.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, in lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "two hundred and fifteen thousand one hundred and fifty-five dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three hundred thousand dollars," the paragraph to then read:

"For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $300,000."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask unanimous consent to close debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto in thirty minutes.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. I would suggest that an extension of the time, longer than that, would be advisable.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that it is my intention to offer an amendment carrying another appropriation when the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE] is disposed of, and I would not consent to close debate upon the amendment I intend to offer myself.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask unanimous consent, then, to close debate on the pending amendment in twenty minutes.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Make it twenty-five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I will modify that request and ask that debate on this amendment close in twenty-five minutes, with the understanding that the last five minutes may be used on this side.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Under whose control is the time to be?

Mr. SCOTT. Let the Chair control the time, with the understanding simply that the last five minutes may be used on this side to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in twenty-five minutes, with the understanding that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture shall have control of the last five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, in addressing the committee on this amendment I feel that I can not cover the subject more fully than I did in my recent argument in favor of this appropriation last Thursday, but there were some statements made by the gentleman from Kansas, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, upon which I wish to express my difference with him. One was with regard to the lack of necessity for additional appropriation for the demonstration work. The tenor of his argument on Saturday was to the effect that what was needed was for the purpose of the Bureau of Entomology rather than for the Bureau of Plant Industry, for the further study of the life history, as it were, of the boll weevil rather than for the demonstration work. Upon this I beg to differ with him most radically. I live in a section where this insect has recently made its appearance. I live in a parish whose crop of 22,000 bales—I speak in round numbers—in 1904 was reduced as the result of the ravages of this insect to 1,300 bales in 1909, practically a total failure.

Adjacent to me is the parish of Pointe Coupee, where 58,000 bales of cotton were produced in 1904, and yet in 1909, in round numbers, there were only about 6,000 bales produced in that parish. And so it is all through this section, and the main cause of that great decrease in cotton production is due to the ravages of the Mexican cotton boll weevil.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman again state the figures?

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I am only speaking in round numbers.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand; but I did not catch your statement exactly.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I will give you the figures of the banner year, 1904. In that year in the parish of West Feliciana, where I reside, there were produced, in round numbers, 22,000 bales of cotton. In the year 1909 it produced, in round numbers, 1,300 bales of cotton. Of course, in making that statement, I do not profess to state the figures exactly, but that is approximately correct, as shown by the census report. And so it is throughout that section and throughout the parishes where this weevil has made its appearance; and there is the same proportionate result throughout the cotton belt in Louisiana.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not a local matter. Why, the Secretary of Agriculture in his report states that the loss in 1908 as a result of this insect was nearly $30,000,000. The members of the Bureau of Plant Industry, such authorities as W. D. Hunter and others, have placed the annual loss as the result of the insect at $25,000,000. Yet, in the face of all this, in face of the further statement of the Secretary of Agriculture that this is a question of the greatest moment, one that will require years to fathom, in the face of all that, how much of the $13,000,000 carried in this bill is devoted to the purposes sought by this paragraph? Only $215,000, speaking in round numbers.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that such an amount is not sufficient, and it does not comport well with this fact that of the total value of all the agricultural products of the United States produced in the year 1909 the cotton crop amounts to one-thirteenth of the whole in value; and yet in this appropriation hardly one-fiftieth of the total appropriations carried in the bill is devoted for this purpose. Now, I wish to answer a statement of the gentleman from Kansas, made recently——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I ask for one minute. He stated an instance on Saturday in regard to a plantation where the grower had followed out the instructions of the Bureau of Plant Industry and yet had made a total failure last year, whereas in former years, before the advent of the weevil, they made hundreds of bales. The gentleman's statement proves, not the necessity of doing away with the demonstration work, but that you should keep it up all the more vigorously, because the people knew in that section that that farm was conducted last year under the supervision of the Bureau of Plant Industry. And unless they do keep up the work, there as well as in other localities, they will become more skeptical, whereas I know, and the demonstration workers of the Bureau of Plant Industry know, that the results in that locality might have been very different but for the most abnormal weather conditions, and that the failure in 1909 in that locality was not due to the fault of the system of cotton culture demonstrated by the bureau. Hence, to convince the skeptical it is necessary to keep up this work. [Applause.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, on last Saturday when the vote was taken as to whether the amount should be changed so as to give $500,000 for this purpose there was a majority vote in favor of increasing the amount to $500,000. The proposition now under consideration is for a lower amount, making it $300,000, a saving of $200,000 from the amount that was asked on Saturday. When the vote was taken this morning the proposition which was carried on Saturday by a rising vote was lost on a vote by tellers. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the reason largely for that change was the statement by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, made on Saturday evening, to this effect: That there was one plantation in the State of Louisiana, composed of several hundred acres, which with the highest cultivation under this system had not been able by the most progressive and improved methods of cultivation to make a single bale of cotton; a plantation which, he added, before that time had made hundreds of bales of cotton. It is for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that it was due to the adverse condition of the weather that the failure was made on that plantation, and does not apply to the system, that I make this explanation to the membership of the House.

Mr. Chairman, that plantation was in a locality in which there had been an overflow. They were very late in the season in that section in planting their crops. One of the requirements of this cultural method is that the crops shall be planted early; also shall be fertilized thoroughly and worked rapidly. In this case they did not fertilize, they could not plant early, and could not work rapidly because of the conditions of the weather. They were not able to plow until the water had receded, and could not put their crop in early, they could not fertilize it, and were not able to cultivate it rapidly as they had to wait until the ground was dry. In reference to the good effect that is obtained by this method, I will state that in my particular section, which was the first that was visited by the boll weevil in that State, this work has been of untold benefit.

When the boll weevil first appeared there laborers were leaving the plantations in vast numbers. A great many of those people are ignorant and became easily frightened. They went to various sections of the country; some to Mississippi, some to Oklahoma and Arkansas and other places not then visited by the boll weevil; but they are now returning, and are raising very good crops of cotton on the lands which they once abandoned, and they are enabled to do this because of the fact that they are receiving this assistance from the National Government. In one of the parishes in Louisiana I attended a meeting at which there were 90 men present who had been engaged in this demonstration and experimental work in that parish. Out of the 90 there was only one who said he had not been materially benefited by this cultural method. Eighty-nine out of the 90 in giving their experience said they had made from 25 to 50 per cent more cotton under this cultural method than their neighbors had made without the cultural system. In the 9 parishes in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, this cooperative demonstration farm work is going on, and has been for several years. During that time the increase of cotton has been gradual all the time, and through this cultural cooperative demonstration method established by the Government we are now able to make nearly as good crops as we made before the boll weevil made its visitation there. The same is the case in certain sections of Texas.

This statement does not apply in its full efficacy to the alluvial lands, the Red River bottoms, and the bayous and creeks that are subject to overflow, in which localities the people can not plant as early as they can upon the hill sections of the country.

I believe if this House knew the real facts in the case they would not hesitate even now to increase the appropriation in this bill from $215,000 to $500,000; but in asking to raise the amount to $300,000 we certainly are not asking anything unreasonable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WATKINS. I am sorry to know that, because I wish to state that the department is now withdrawing its agents in some instances because there are not sufficient funds to keep them there.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire the particular attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. SCOTT] while I make my statement, because I wish him to hear it. In his remarks on Saturday he quoted from the testimony of Mr. Hunter, of the Bureau of Entomology, a statement which, in my opinion, ought to be corrected.

There are two elements in the disaster accompanying the boll weevil. The first is the work of destruction done by the insect itself, and the other, which, in my opinion, is the vastly more serious element, is the panic which takes possession of the minds of men whenever the presence of the weevil is announced. That panic is due to just such statements as that quoted from Mr. Hunter, and this declaration that a man on 700 acres of land could not raise a bale of cotton, and other stories of similarly frightful import, paraded about the country under a rawhead-and-bloody-bones banner, have done more damage to the cotton raisers of the South than the boll weevil.

I say the plantation concerning which that statement was made is not a typical plantation, and the results in that particular parish will show that these conditions are not general.

I have the record of 17 planters in this very parish in which this plantation is located who last year followed the cultural method of this bureau of farm demonstration, and of those 17 the smallest yield per acre was 900 pounds, the highest being 1,500 pounds of seed cotton.

That means from $60 to $100 an acre, and mark you, Mr. Chairman, this is in the very parish where Mr. Hunter's 700-acre planter could not raise a bale.

I hope the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture will give me his attention, because he quoted this statement of Mr. Hunter and then added:

> This man has taken advantage of all the information available, and yet he was not able to raise a bale of cotton on 700 acres of land. It certainly leaves the conclusion inevitable that we have nothing to demonstrate. What is the use of appropriating a large sum of money, to be expended in demonstrations, when we have no methods that have proven satisfactory? That is the question, and upon that I think the Members of the House should base their judgment. It is not a question of demonstrating something which has already been learned, the success of which has been proven. It is simply a question of conducting research and experimentation that will result in developing a method which we may demonstrate hereafter.

If this be true; if the cultural methods pursued in Texas, and by which the farmers there have been able to successfully combat the weevil, are of no avail in the alluvial deltas of the Mississippi; if, as he states, "no more intelligent fight could have been made against this insect than was made by this planter," and still on 700 acres not one bale could be produced, and if this illustration is typical, the calamity which is about to befall my district, which is practically all delta, has had no counterpart in the South since Sherman marched to the sea. But, happily for us, Mr. Hunter is not the only witness who has testified in this matter. This is too serious a matter to hazard any statement upon without giving such authority as may be found and questioned if corroboration is desired, and so I append the names of the planters, their post-office addresses, the variety of the cotton planted, and the yield per acre. All of these are in Avoyelles Parish, the home of the 700-acre failure cited by Mr. Hunter.

Speaking for my single self and intending criticism for no one, if I had wished to know what progress had been made in the discovery of cultural methods wherewith to fight the weevil, I would have asked the distinguished gentleman at the head of that work. If I had wished to know of the life habits of the insect, then I would have gone to the Bureau of Entomology. I would readily accept the theory of Mr. Hunter in all questions of entomology, but I hardly think he can expect unbiased minds to yield to his opinion when it conflicts with that of Doctor Knapp on the subject of farm demonstration work. Let every cobbler stick to his last. Doctor Hunter is an entomologist, or, as the common run of mankind sometimes say, he is a "bugologist." He knows more bugs by their first names than all the men in Doctor Knapp's division, but he is entirely out of his class when he meets that most competent and efficient official in the field of actual crop-demonstration work. I feel some confidence, therefore, in submitting in rebuttal this letter, which I received this morning and which speaks for itself:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1910.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to your request for some facts in reference to cotton production in the boll-weevil districts of Louisiana and Mississippi, will state:

You may make your assertion just as strong as you wish in regard to our ability to make cotton under the most adverse boll-weevil conditions, both in the hill lands and in the alluvial lands of the States in question, provided the planter carefully follows our methods. Inclosed you will find a few letters from the large number in our possession and documents that will fully substantiate what we affirm. I call your special attention to the clipping from the banker at Natchitoches and to the letter from Hon. Charles Schuler, commissioner of agriculture of the State of Louisiana. Mr. Schuler owns a large plantation in the boll-weevil district and has been conversant with our fight from the commencement. He is a man whose word is taken everywhere at face value. If you want more documents we can furnish them.

Owing to the necessity of reaching you so early this morning I have not time to copy these documents, and would be glad to secure copies of them before they pass out of your hands, because I may use them in some future work.

Our most serious difficulty in producing cotton in the delta districts infested with the weevil is not the boll weevil; it is the loss of credit and of labor. Practically all the cotton is made on the credit system, and when the bankers and merchants refuse to advance the labor abandons the territory and goes to another county. Wilkinson County, Miss., has lost eighteen hundred negro families in the last eighteen months. Once the labor has left, it requires time to restore confidence and secure a return of the labor. During all this time the reduction in normal yield of cotton is charged to bool-weevil depredation.

Furthermore, in the Delta there has always been a certain portion of the land that in wet seasons was not sufficiently well drained to make a cotton crop successfully, and the reports for the past fifty years show periodic declines in cotton production of 50 per cent or more, due to wet season. If we can restore confidence and limit the planting of cotton to the well-drained lands, there is no more difficulty in raising cotton in the Delta than in any other portion of the country.

Tranking you for your interest in the matter, I remain, as ever,

Yours, faithfully,

S. A. KNAPP,
Special Agent in Charge.

Hon. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS, M. C.
Washington, D. C.

I am sorry I can not produce the letter to-day, but I will state the fact that Mr. F. L. Maxwell, one of the largest and most successful planters in north Louisiana, last year planted fifteen hundred acres in cotton—in the Delta, mind you—and cultivated it according to the directions of Doctor Knapp, and at the date of his letter he said that he had ginned 700 bales, had 60 picked and ready to gin, and, to use his expression, "there is more to pick."

I have a letter from Prof. Charles Schuler, commissioner of agriculture for the State of Louisiana, from which I make this quotation touching the question of raising cotton in the Delta under boll-weevil conditions, and I submit it against the theory which the chairman of this great committee has been converted to:

The banks of Mississippi and Tennessee might be referred to the banks of Shreveport, Natchitoches, and other points in the alluvial section of north Louisiana, where diversification and cultured methods have been adopted, showing clearly that cotton can be made on the alluvial lands where proper attention is taken and proper efforts are made, in spite of the boll weevil.

When the agricultural appropriation bill was in the House a year ago I went very fully into this theory, which the entomologists had advanced, that it would be much more difficult, if, indeed, not impossible, to raise cotton successfully in the Delta under boll-weevil conditions, and I am sorry the chairman has fallen from grace since then, because I am sure he was converted at that time.

The general education board paid me the compliment of having that speech printed in pamphlet form and circulating it by the thousand through the South. If figures can prove anything, I believe those given in that speech demonstrate beyond question that cotton can be grown in the Delta just as it has been grown in Texas in spite of the weevil.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not misjudge or undervalue the seriousness of the situation which confronts the Delta planters, but I do not believe they are going to fare worse than their brothers in Texas have fared. If they are stiff-necked and stubbornly refuse to change their present methods, they will surely suffer, and I have no doubt that many of them will do that very foolish thing; but the point which I am contending for is that experience has shown that if they will observe faithfully the instructions of the department and follow the cultural methods prescribed then they can whip the weevil, and in order to spread that gospel throughout the cotton belt I believe this amendment should be adopted.

When the chairman says that no methods have so far been discovered to successfully combat the weevil in the Delta, and therefore there is nothing to demonstrate, he has simply been led into error by the Bureau of Entomology. He is a just man. No Member of the House has the interest of the agriculturist nearer to heart than he, and yet his statement is calculated to work great damage if permitted to go unchallenged. I ask him therefore now, before this bill is out of this House, to write to Secretary Wilson and ask him if the statement he made last Saturday, and to which I have already adverted, is borne out by the experience of the department in its actual work in the field, and then I want him to print the Secretary's reply in the RECORD.

I may take occasion to say more on this subject later on, when my time is not so limited as it is to-day, but for the present I will content myself with repeating again what Doctor Knapp says in his letter:

You may make your assertion just as strong as you wish in regard to our ability to make cotton under the most adverse boll-weevil conditions, both in the hill lands and in the alluvial lands in the States in question, provided the planter carefully follows our methods.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said this much in reply to the statement of Mr. Hunter, quoted by the chairman, for this reason, that if it be true that cotton can not be produced in the alluvial lands of the Delta, then the value of those lands must be cut in two, aye, cut in four, and I am not willing for that statement to go out to the country unchallenged with the influence that necessarily goes with it, from the fact that it is indorsed by the chairman of this committee, when, as a matter of fact, the records of the Agricultural Department show to the contrary. [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I regret to urge any addition to this bill formulated by the Agricultural Committee and so ably presented by its distinguished chairman. I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas to the extent that I think it is the best bill that has been presented to this House during this session, but I did think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, appropriating $500,000 to aid in exterminating the cotton weevil, should have been passed. I am now in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, increasing the present appropriation in the agricultural bill to $300,000.

This greatest of all staples and money crops is threatened to an extent almost alarming, which affects the grower, the manufacturer, and consumer, as we'l as every interest of this great country.

(The following statistics, compiled by Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, were then presented by Mr. HUGHES of Georgia:)

	1909.	1907.	Deficit.	Loss.[a]
Louisiana	251,643	662,543	410,900	$32,872,000
Do	251,643	[b]965,473	703,830	56,306,400
Five counties in Mississippi:
Adams	1,592	15,467	13,875	$1,110,000
Claiborne	8,893	24,183	15,290	1,223,200
Amite	13,612	25,568	11,956	956,480
Franklin	5,421	15,045	9,624	769,920
Wilkinson	4,271	23,128	18,857	1,508,560
Total	33,789	103,391	69,602	[c]5,568,160

[c] Deficit from 1906 (67.2 per cent), $5,721,120.

This table of statistics is a most startling revelation and should cause every Member of this House to pause and consider before he votes against the proposed appropriation.

I am glad to know that it has not reached Georgia yet, but, like a mighty army of destruction and annihilation, it is moving Georgiaward at the rate of 60 miles per annum, and if not checked will soon be "marching through Georgia" to devastate the Carolinas. [Laughter and applause.]

I have that confidence in Secretary Wilson and the Agriculture Department to believe that if they are not in possession of science and scientific men to check and control the boll weevil, this department will obtain the information if they have to search the entire globe, provided this Congress will furnish the necessary funds. Then, if it be declared by the department that science can not furnish a sufficient remedy, the last resort should be to establish a zone, say 120 miles wide, the entire length of the cotton belt, in which the planting of cotton should be prohibited for three years.

In my State, Georgia, the second cotton State and the largest peach-growing State in the Union, the San Jose scale attacked our magnificent peach orchards, from which we make our summer money crop. Along the same lines proposed by those opposed to this bill the State neglected to make appropriations sufficiently large to check the progress of the scale until it nearly covered the State, causing losses to the grower and nurseryman of millions of dollars. At last, however, a sufficient amount was appropriated to induce scientific research and demonstration until a remedy was found, which, when properly applied, reduced the injury to the minimum.

You will pardon me here for stating a little incident. One of my tenants had contracted smallpox and had recovered sufficiently for me to approach within calling distance. I told him I was glad to see he was recovering from the smallpox. He answered:

Boss, I ha'in't had no smallpox. Hit wuz jest dem dar skales whut I kotched in der peach orchard.

[Laughter.]

This tenant believes this to-day to the extent that I can not hire him to work in my orchard. Now, if our Georgia negroes can catch the scale from the peach trees, as they imagine, why can not the negro of the Southern States catch the boll weevil from our cotton, by imagination? I am told that in those States already affected by the boll weevil that the negroes were "flushed" on the arrival of the weevil, just as a covey of partridges are scattered by an indiscreet but sensitive pointer. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the event the boll weevil continues its attack on the cotton of the Southern States, the population of those States which do not grow cotton may be increased by millions. I assure you not only the South but this entire Nation has cause for alarm. Therefore we urge the adoption of this amendment. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. There are five minutes still remaining under the order agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to address this body of farmers for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent was had some twenty minutes ago to close debate on this amendment in twenty-five minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding that, if the gentleman does not himself object, he can hear my eloquence for five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know whether it will rest within my power or not.

The CHAIRMAN. It is within the power of the committee to extend the time for five minutes. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, in asking for unanimous consent I said I desired to talk to the farmers here for five minutes, because in looking over the House I observe that the merchants and professional men generally have all departed from the Chamber and left here only those who are interested in this great farming subject.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the gentleman from Alabama is here.

Mr. CLAYTON. And I note that the great advocate of cow butter [Mr. TAWNEY] has come into the Chamber [laughter], and I wish he would cease his strenuous advocacy of a tax on oleomargarine and let us have a cheap as well as a good substitute for butter, so that the poor people of the country, who are unable to buy cow butter, may have this wholesome and palatable article of food to spread on their bread.

Mr. TAWNEY. You can get it now.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; you can get oleomargarine now, but you have to pay a high tax on every pound of it that you consume. This oleomargarine is just as wholesome as cow butter and is chemically purer than the average cow butter. Refined cotton-seed oil enters into its manufacture.

Mr. OLMSTED. Would you be willing to label it butter?

Mr. CLAYTON. If you will label your renovated butter honestly, I am willing to have the substitute labeled, and I believe that it ought to be labeled just what it is. This oleomargarine is made of the caul fat of the beef and olive oil produced from cotton seed. [Laughter and applause.] And I believe 30 per cent of cream enters into its composition.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am always glad to enlighten California and to be enlightened by the gentleman from California.

Mr. SMITH of California. Is it not true that, under the present law, you can sell oleomargarine freely and without tax in the market?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not understand that—not if you color it.

Mr. SMITH of California. But suppose you do not color it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, the poor people want their butter or oleomargarine colored yellow.

Mr. SMITH of California. And you want to make some people think it is cow butter.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, we do not object to Yankee-doodlers putting up the fish the way they do. They catch off the coast of New England fish that are not sardines and put them up in our cotton-seed oil and say they are genuine imported French sardines, put up in pure olive oil. [Laughter.]

We understand that game down in the South, and I do not believe that there is a blue-gum nigger in Alabama who would not rather eat imitation French sardines put up in cotton-seed oil than to eat the genuine article imported from France. That demonstrates that Yankee ingenuity can take cotton-seed oil and convert it into a better thing than olive oil, and that they can take your fishes up there that are not sardines and make sardines out of them that some people relish as much as French sardines. [Laughter and applause.] And I may say that Yankee ingenuity has done in the matter of furnishing a substitute for butter much for the human family, and has invented a process of making oleomargarine a wholesome substitute for butter. Everybody knows that there is not enough cow butter produced in the United States for half the population. It is also true that in every civilized country resort has been made to a wholesome substitute to supply the deficiency of butter. I think most of us who have been in Washington for several years have in the main been eating oleomargarine and without any deleterious effect.

Several months ago the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. MacVeagh, according to the newspapers, favored the repeal of the oleomargarine tax. The statements accredited to him on the subject were sensible and commendable. I am sorry that he has refrained from calling further public attention to the good reasons for the repeal of the oleomargarine tax. It would be a good time for him to urge his views now, when everything on the breakfast table is so high.

The oleomargarine is free of tax if it is uncolored. Whenever it is colored to make it more attractive, then an enormous tax is laid upon it, intended to prevent the use of the attractive article of oleomargarine. As a matter of fact, a large part of cow butter is colored. It is common knowledge that the market in one city demands a deeper yellow than the market in another city, and the butter people know this, and they color their butter according to the market in which it is to be sold. Why is coloring matter used? It is to make it more attractive, and it is as much a fraud to put foreign coloring matter in butter as it is to put coloring matter into oleomargarine. While I am on this subject let me say that the greatest fraud practiced on the innocent people in the matter of the butter supply is in the sale of this abominable stuff commonly called "renovated butter." It is gathered up out of the old tubs in the cellars and elsewhere in the store and then it is taken to a creamery, put through a churning process, colored, and put on the market as pure creamery butter. It is not fit to be fed to a decent bird dog. This rancid and spoiled butter instead of being renovated and sold as an article of food ought to go into soap or axle grease. The hearings before the committees of Congress have demonstrated that no amount of renovation of rancid butter can ever make it a wholesome article of food.

I wish there could be produced enough cow butter to supply every poor family in the Union with it at a reasonable price; but not many poor men can eat cow butter at present prices. My friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] tells me that he now pays 48 cents a pound for butter in Brooklyn. Take the tax off of oleomargarine. You can still enforce your law requiring its inspection and that it be branded as oleomargarine, giving the poor people a chance to butter their bread with an attractive and wholesome article. It will not drive the inadequate supply of cow butter out of the market, nor will it affect its price. The only effect of the repeal of the oleomargarine tax would be to give the humble poor a chance to use this good article of food at a cheaper price than that now extorted from them.

But, Mr. Chairman, I intended to address myself to the consideration of the question now before the committee. In the brief time allotted to me I want to talk about this boll-weevil pest. Last summer I had the pleasure of attending the meeting of the experts of the Agricultural Department engaged in demonstration work, showing how to overcome and prevent the evil of the boll weevil. Doctor Knapp, of the Agricultural Department, is at the head of this good work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Give me five minutes more. I want to talk about the boll weevil. At the suggestion of my colleague here, Mr. HEFLIN, I will keep off of the subject of neo cosmospora vas infecta, the wilt in cotton, or "black root," as it is sometimes called, a subject that the Agricultural Department has thoroughly investigated and given out valuable information about. And the thanks of every cotton grower ought to be returned to professor Atkinson, now professor of botany of Cornell University, formerly of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, and to Professor Wilcox, formerly of the same institute, but now a professor in the Agricultural College of Nebraska, for their valuable researches and advice to the farmers in the matter of preventing that disease of the cotton plant.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to continue for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thank you, sir. I will never raise my voice against Connecticut or Vermont selling wooden nutmegs again. I shall not complain of the Vermonter for making maple sirup out of maple shavings and glucose. This reminds me that Secretary Wilson, I am told, says that the best sirup on earth is made from the cane down in Georgia and Alabama. And I am told that he sends down there every year for sirup to go on his batter cakes and waffles.

Mr. SISSON. And Mississippi.

Mr. CANDLER. And Mississippi, too. We are making it there.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; you are making it to some extent in Mississippi. That State promises to do a great many things in the near future, and if she keeps her present delegation of able farmers in this House, Mississippi will come to the front all along the line. [Applause.] Seriously, Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any Member of this House who has been here any length of time who has been more watchful of the great agricultural interests than my friend ZEKE CANDLER, who has just interrupted me. And I am glad to know that his colleague, Mr. SISSON, much younger in the service here, is engaged in the same laudable work.

Returning to the boll-weevil question and to the convention of experts here under the auspices of Doctor Knapp's department last summer, let me say that there were 20 or 30 of these experts, every one of them an intelligent man and practical farmer. They came from the cotton fields. I heard them make their reports on the work of combating the boll weevil. They have learned much about this pest, and have suggested valuable plans for the mitigation, if not the ultimate destruction, of the boll weevil.

They have discovered that the insect belongs to the beetle family, and that therefore, being a hard-back creature, it can not be poisoned with powder after the manner of poisoning some insects. They have also discovered that it can not be poisoned with Paris green, as potato bugs are poisoned. They have not as yet found an effective way to exterminate the insect by the use of poison. They have learned about his habits. They know that he hibernates in the crevices of cotton stalks, cornstalks, and in old stumps, in fence rails, and, to some extent, in near-by forest trees; and I see it stated that he hibernates to some extent in the Spanish moss on the trees in Louisiana. If he should ever spread to a certain noncotton-producting State he might hibernate in whiskers. [Laughter and applause.] I believe that State is credited with a greater percentage of literacy than any other State in the Union. I have not examined the facts, and I sometimes hear it said that it has as much patriotism in its borders as any State in the Union. This, I doubt not, is true. And I sometimes hear it said that it has more whiskers to the square mile than any other State in the Union. [Laughter.]

Now, this boll weevil comes out of winter quarters when the little cotton plant is taking on the forms which are to mature into bolls. When the insect first comes from winter quarters it is in a logy condition, something like some of you on the other side who go to banquets and the next morning are not feeling very bright. [Laughter.] These experts who have engaged in this demonstration work advise the catching and destruction of as many of this first crop of weevils as is possible, after the manner of catching and destroying tobacco worms. The weevils that remain to infest the cotton puncture the little square or incipient boll and deposit the eggs in this square. In about ten days or two weeks these squares, being then dead, fall off. If these squares are permitted to remain on the warm ground a few days the sun will hatch out another crop of weevils. Without this opportunity the weevil can not be reproduced. It is said that one pair of boll weevils, if unmolested, will produce a progeny or family of 12,000,000 in one season.

These experts, under Doctor Knapp, have suggested a plan for combating these pests, and their demonstration work has proven the efficiency of this plan. They suggest that early maturing varieties be planted—varieties that will produce at least a fair crop of cotton before the family of boll weevils has increased sufficiently to do great damage. They suggest that the cotton acreage be reduced, so that intensifying, both in fertilizing and in cultural methods, may be adopted.

Of course, where the lands are rich and, therefore, commercial fertilizer is not used, it is suggested that intensive cultural methods will suffice. The object of decreasing the acreage is, of course, to intensify in cultivation and to make it easier to carry out a further suggestion that they present, namely, that twice during the early bearing period of the cotton hands should be sent through the cotton fields and the squares that have fallen on the ground be gathered and burned before the eggs of the weevil are hatched. This decrease in the cotton acreage under this plan does not necessarily mean a decrease in production, for the increased fertilizers, or the improved cultivation, one or both, will result in an increase of cotton per acre. The plan is to make two bales grow where one grows now. If one man and his family on a plantation produce now, say, 10 or 15 bales of cotton on 20 or 30 acres of land, it is believed that the plan suggested will result in just as great a yield of cotton on the lesser acreage. And another benefit to come from it is that it will bring greater diversification of crops in the South. More land will be given over to corn, oats, peas, and potatoes than is now the case, and every plantation would be self-sustaining in the matter of bread for man and provender for beast.

Doctor Knapp warns the cotton grower in the States not infested that the boll weevil is coming. It is now within about 80 miles of the west line of Alabama. It travels at the rate of from 40 to 60 miles a year. At this rate it will appear in Alabama before a great while and will make its way eastward to Georgia and the other Atlantic cotton States.

This demonstration work, for which this appropriation is asked, has been of great benefit, and its continued activity will accomplish much more than even the great good that has already been accomplished. To overcome the destruction wrought by the boll weevil is a problem that the southern farmer must solve, and he ought to have the cooperation of the Government and the best wishes of every patriotic American.

My New England brethren are interested in the subject as much as we from the South are. Many of the towns of New England owe much of their prosperity and life to the cotton-spinning industry. If the ravages of the boll weevil are not hindered you of New England will see the day when you will complain of 40 cents a pound cotton, and every workingman in the land will complain of the cost of his hickory shirt or his overalls.

The bill reported by the Agricultural Committee provides $215,000 for carrying on this fight against the boll weevil. The amendment offered by my friend from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE] seeks to raise the amount to $300,000. This sum certainly is not an excessive amount. I hope it may be a sufficient amount. I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman and gentleman, to let us have the $300,000 to prosecute the work now so ably conducted by Doctor Knapp and his assistants. Give it to avert a national calamity; give it in aid of the preservation of the great cotton industry. Let cotton continue to clothe the people. Let the delicate cotton fabrics be the silk and fine raiment of the poor. Let cotton continue to make the towns of New England and the South prosperous. Let us see to it that cotton shall remain the chief item of our exports to foreign countries, bringing to us foreign gold, the balance of trade in favor of our Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have five minutes in which to close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks upon this subject last Saturday I stated that no one had appeared before the Committee on Agriculture asking for an increase of this appropriation. The statement was literally and technically true, and yet it is capable of a construction which might do injustice to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE].

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to show the chairman why it was that they did not appear. The committee had made up its bill before they got ready to appear.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope that I am not unreasonable in asking that I may not be interrupted when I have only reserved five minutes in which to reply to thirty minutes' debate on the other side.

The fact that the committee was forehanded in its work does not seem to me to be a matter which should subject it to criticism.

I started to say that while the statement made was literally and technically true, it might be construed as an injustice to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE]. I desire to state that he introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, asking for an appropriation of $300,000 for this work, and he spoke to the chairman of the committee in reference to the bill and urged a favorable report upon it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the merits of the arguments that have been presented in favor of this amendment. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE] made a statement which seems to me to confirm very fully the position I took on Saturday. He said that in his home parish, in the banner year of 1904, there were 22,000 bales of cotton produced, whereas last year only 1,300 bales were produced, and this in the face of the fact that the work of demonstrating methods which have up to this time been developed was vigorously carried on.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. It had just commenced and the people had not had a chance or opportunity to take hold of the matter to see it practically demonstrated and the success of it proved.

Mr. SCOTT. There is evidence that if it had been taken hold of long ago and more opportunity had been given, the result would yet not have justified the increase demanded in this amendment. I refer again to the testimony of Mr. Hunter. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], seems to have the impression that I quoted Mr. Hunter as making a general statement to the effect that the demonstration work was of no value, that methods which have been developed in Texas have no value in Louisiana or Mississippi. I certainly did not intend to give that impression, and I do not think I made any statement that would warrant it. Mr. Hunter simply cited a single instance in which the production had fallen from 1,700 bales to nothing in three years in spite of the most intelligent application of all the methods with which they are now familiar.

Mr. Hunter did declare that in some localities in the humid country he thought it might be possible to grow cotton in spite of the boll weevil. He said:

> In certain situations, in the eastern humid country, I believe it is possible to produce as much cotton as was produced formerly, but those certain situations are very small indeed compared to the total area that has been planted in cotton. The boll weevil is undoubtedly going to cause a remarkable redistribution of the production of cotton. It is first going to be a redistribution in large areas. What were large centers of production formerly are going to fall down; and more than that, there is going to be a redistribution on individual plantations. The soil and other conditions in certain parts of almost every plantation in the South will permit the planter to continue to raise cotton profitably in spite of the boll weevil. On many of the plantations in Louisiana those favorable conditions occur upon remarkably small portions of the total acreage. In the cases are large properties with which I am familiar, something like 55,000 acres, the soil and other conditions that would permit the profitable cultivation of cotton now without loss do not cover as much as 1 per cent of the total area. On certain lands, the front lands, the higher and better areas on these plantations, it is possible to produce an early crop, which is absolutely necessary in making cotton in the face of the weevil. Where you get away from these front lands and the drainage is poor it is impossible to produce an early crop, no matter at what time the seed is put into the ground, and no matter how careful cultivation is given it. It is in those large, back-from-the-front lands that the production is going to fall off. According to all we know at present about fighting the boll weevil, cotton can not any longer be planted profitably in such situations.

In view of this statement by Mr. Hunter, statements which are corroborated in very large part by the plant-industry officials, methods have not yet been devised which have proven satisfactory in the humid delta country. I insist that the first duty of the department is to devise methods which will be effective and satisfactory, and until such methods have been devised I believe it would be extravagant to appropriate large sums of money to be used in demonstrating methods the efficacy of which has not been proved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE].

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the Chair was in doubt.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, to save time, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE] took their place as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 108.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 18, line 18, strike out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "fifty," so that the paragraph will read "$250,155."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to close debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto in fifteen minutes, if that is satisfactory to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. Make it twenty minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. And close debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto?

Mr. HEFLIN. Provided I can have time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SCOTT. I will ask unanimous consent that debate be closed in twenty minutes on the paragraph and all amendments thereto, the time to be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate close in fifteen minutes on the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in fifteen minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 48.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee, I trust I will be able to summarize in five minutes the situation with reference to the boll weevil as I see it. It seems the gentleman from Kansas entirely misapprehends the situation with reference to the work being performed by the two bureaus in the Department of Agriculture against the boll weevil. In a statement to the committee on Saturday the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kansas, said that "What is needed now is experiment work and not demonstration work." I admit that if the chairman of the committee is correct in his view of the case, then we do not need another dollar more for the boll-weevil work than is carried in this bill, but I submit, and I submit it to the candid judgment of that side of the House, that the question is not a question of experimentation any more, but it is a question of actual demonstration. The Bureau of Entomology for about six years has been experimenting in an effort to find a parasite, a natural enemy to the boll weevil. That work, in my judgment, so far has been a practical failure. Dr. Hunter, in his hearing before the committee a year ago, in answer to a question by the chairman of the committee on this very point, makes this statement:

The chairman asked Doctor Hunter if he had addressed any public hearings in Louisiana and Mississippi. Doctor Hunter replied that he had. Then the chairman asked "What was the nature of advice that you gave the farmers?" and here is the advice that he gave:

I have made the statement at those meetings in general that there is only a small part of the belt in Texas that can be compared with theirs, on account of the difference in the condition. I have made the statement that they can not continue to produce cotton in the old way upon certain kinds of soil where the drainage is poor—in the low valleys in Louisiana and Mississippi—that they can not hope to produce cotton profitably in view of all we know of the boll weevil. They have tried to produce cotton under these conditions in Louisiana for two years, and they have failed utterly. I have told them that where the land is poorly drained, and that is the land which in former years produced the most profitable crops, that it is absolutely useless to plant cotton at this time.

What does that statement mean? It means Doctor Hunter admits himself that, so far as the parasite theory is concerned, he has reached practically the limit of his investigation and found no satisfactory solution. What else does it mean? It means that Doctor Hunter himself admits that the only successful way to control the boll-weevil situation is to control it through the development of cultural methods, and it is to that division of the bureau doing demonstration work, growing cotton in spite of the weevil, we desire to appropriate this small increase of money.

I want to call the attention of my friends on the other side of the House to this fact: This boll-weevil proposition is not a Texas proposition, nor a Louisiana proposition, nor a Mississippi proposition, nor a southern state proposition even. It is a question of such magnitude, of so much vital concern to all the people of this country, in that it seriously threatens the destruction of one of the country's chief supplies of clothing material, that it has become a national problem; and you gentlemen on the other side are just as much interested in it as we in the South. Your great cotton-manufacturing industries of the East are built up upon and live because of raw southern cotton. Destroy this and your great mills must close their doors and send their employees out into the world and into other occupations. The world, even, is concerned in this matter. It is a great national and international question, large enough to arrest the attention and command the favorable consideration of any legislative body on earth.

I want to call your attention to another fact, that the most important bug that ever set its face in the direction of this country is this same boll weevil. He has the San Jose scale, the potato bug, the gypsy moth, and all other kinds of bugs skinned a mile when it comes to the work of destruction. You are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on the San Jose scale and the potato bug and all sorts of other bugs in this country.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars on the gypsy moth.

Mr. CANDLER. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill appropriates $300,000 for the purpose of carrying on the war against the gypsy moth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this to come out of the fifteen minutes?

Mr. SCOTT. I think it must. Debate has been closed by a vote of the committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. If it is to come out of the fifteen minutes, I shall have to object, because I want to be heard.

Mr. LEVER. I ask for two minutes more in which to close this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if the gentleman from South Carolina proceeds for two minutes more he would be entitled to his full five minutes, unless there was an agreement between him and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] for a division of the five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. That is all right. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] then.

Now Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of my friends on that side of the House again to the fact that we carry in this very bill $300,000 for the purpose of fighting the brown-tail and gypsy moths in the New England States. I can not believe, and I do not intimate for a moment, that gentlemen on that side of the House will for a second permit themselves to be lined up against this proposition because it happens to be a southern proposition. I know that there is no comparison between the damage done by the gypsy moth and the boll weevil, and I want to appeal to your sense of fairness to give us this small increase, only a little over $25,000; and in closing I want to call your attention to a statement made by Doctor Galloway before the committee two years ago on this very proposition.

Doctor Knapp, in charge of the boll-weevil work and the farm demonstration in the South Atlantic coast States, was making a statement, and was interrupted by Doctor Galloway, his chief.

Mr. GALLOWAY. If I may interrupt the doctor, I happen to have the figures here. We are spending now on this work in the several States $104,000. That included the administrative work here in Washington. For Texas it is $30,000, for Oklahoma $10,000, for Arkansas $13,500, for Louisiana $13,500, for Mississippi $14,000. The doctor recommended to the Secretary an increase of $146,000, and the Secretary, considering the department's needs as a whole, as he must, scaled that down to $50,000, and it was left at that figure, so that the matter stands in that way at the present time. The doctor estimated for Alabama $30,000, for Texas $65,000, for Oklahoma $30,000, for Arkansas $30,000, for Louisiana $30,000, for Mississippi $30,000, and for the general administrative expenses $35,000, making a grand total of $250,000 in comparison with $104,000 that we are expending this year, or an increase of $146,000.

That was two years ago. Now, I take it that if the work is of any importance at all it is advancing, and that if $250,000 were necessary two years ago, certainly $250,000 can now be expended economically and judiciously.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has described accurately the boll weevil. He has told you how long he is and how big round he is, and one gentleman says "He's too little to fool with." One thing is certain, I take it, and that is, you gentlemen on that side are not acquainted with the destructive power of this insignificant looking insect.

Mr. Chairman, if the boll weevil were any bigger than he now is, and the mischief that he can now do should increase with his size, and he should multiply and move as fast as he now does, he would not only destroy the cotton boll in the morning of its youth and promise, but he would also "eat up" the cotton stalk.

If the chigger were bigger,
As big as a cow,
And his digger
Had vigor,
Like a subsoil plow,
Can you "figger," Picknicker,
Where you'd be now?

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the boll weevil is the most determined and pestiferous little warrior that ever attacked the precious offspring of the cotton plant. He is a cold and cruel calculator. He watches and waits, and when the time arrives for his work of destruction he ruthlessly slaughters the young hopeful of the cotton plant. He looks upon the cotton bloom in the morning when it bursts, lily white, from the heart of the "square," and he gazes upon it when it turns rosy red in the late afternoon, and he laughs with ghoulish glee when finally it fades and falls. Now is his feast time and now his work of destruction begins. The tiny green boll glistening in the sun, pregnant with the white fiber on which millions of spindles wait and for which millions of human beings yearn, is the proud citadel that he now attacks, and from one end of the cotton row to the other the ground is covered with dead and dying bolls. In this little green boll is locked the snowy product which constitutes the king of American exports. Its white fiber brings gold from foreign countries when all other products fail.

The South is the cotton-producing section of the country, and the South pays more taxes into the Federal Treasury in proportion to its population than any other section; and you gentlemen have it in your power now to do justice to the great cotton industry, and I trust that you will not be prejudiced against the increase that we ask simply because the Committee on Agriculture has already agreed on the sum that we shall have with which to fight this terrible boll weevil. The chairman of that committee [Mr. SCOTT] tells us that no officer from the Department of Agriculture came before the committee asking for an increase in the appropriation of money with which to fight the boll weevil. Well, I have served on that committee, and I know how easy it is for the chairman to frighten the officers of that department into a seeming satisfactory frame of mind with very small appropriations, and often I could see that more money was needed and desired, but the officer in the department had received instructions, and, of course, he did not come and ask for more. This was the Agricultural Department, you know, and should be thankful for small favors, I suppose. I intended going before the committee, and several other Members intended going with me, but the committee finished the bill and reported it to the House a month earlier than we did last year.

Mr. SCOTT. Two months earlier.

Mr. HEFLIN. So, Mr. Chairman, we had no notice of this proposed early action. This is the long session of Congress, and there is no reason for rushing through a bill of so much importance to the agricultural interests of the country. Why was it done this time? Did you want to get it out of the House before the farmers' organizations could arrive in Washington? Were you afraid they would ask you to do more for agriculture? When I was a member of that committee we took more time to consider the great agricultural interests. We did not rush through as you have done. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Year after year I see you increase appropriations for army and navy and other things, and you lay it on with lavish hands, but when it comes to agriculture—the very corner stone on which all other industries rest—you commence to economize. You talk about cutting down expenses, and some of you boast about how much you are doing for the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is, this Government is not doing one-fifth of what it ought to do for the farming interests. True, it is doing more than it has ever done, but there is so much that could be done. Here you have the opportunity to aid us in fighting a far-reaching evil, but you are announcing your purpose to withhold that aid on the idea that you think we have enough already provided for. The boll weevil is doing great damage in Mississippi and Louisiana and other States. Counties that once produced 30,000 bales of cotton a year are now making less than 1,000 bales. This is since the boll weevil appeared on the scene. Now the department tells us that the boll weevil has about reached the line, or has crossed over and is now in Alabama. We will need every dollar we can get to combat this destructive insect.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina. I had intended to offer a similar amendment, and had talked with the gentleman from South Carolina about it. I trust that the gentlemen on the other side will vote for this small increase. We certainly need this amount to help fight this terrible pest that is now in the South. A constituent of mine wrote me a letter to know if there is a premium offered to any man who would invent or discover some method of getting rid of the boll weevil, and I had to reply that there is none. If we can get this additional appropriation we can have a fund out of which the Secretary of Agriculture can offer a sum of money to any man who will find the means by which the boll weevil can be destroyed, and you will put hundreds of heads to work to get up some way to destroy the boll weevil.

The amount reported in this bill is no more than we reported a year ago; and yet you admit that the boll weevil is doing more damage now than ever; and he is entering new fields. Then, of course, the present amount is not sufficient. Now, I want to say to my friends on the other side, when I was a member of the Committee on Agriculture I cheerfully voted for any appropriation you asked for that would help the agricultural interests of the other sections of the country. This is but a small amount, and I trust that you gentlemen can see your way clear to help us by increasing this appropriation from $215,000 to $250,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say a few words in connection with this item in the appropriation bill. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] says that the chairman does not seem to understand the character of this evil in the South. We had before our committee reports of those who are best qualified to speak on this proposition. The Department of Agriculture is engaged in the business of prosecuting this work, and in this appropriation bill you will find the identical items as recommended by the Department of Agriculture. Doctor Knapp and Secretary Wilson and the various other gentlemen who are engaged in conducting this work have placed their stamp of approval upon this item.

Mr. LEVER rose.

Mr. COLE. I can not yield now; I simply wish to make this statement: The Committee on Agriculture has never been charged with being a political committee, and it never has been charged with being a sectional committee, and when the gentleman from South Carolina charges this side of the House with opposing this amendment because of sectional lines, I deny the assertion——

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. COLE. We recognize it as a national problem; we recognize it as being as broad as this Nation; we have exceeded the limits of generosity in making appropriations for the benefit of agriculture in the South. The farmers of Ohio care nothing about the congressional distribution of seed. It has been resolved against in every agricultural interest in my district. But I support it. Why? Because the Members from the South and the farmers from the South want it, and that is one reason why I stand by that appropriation item. That is the reason that I stand by this appropriation as it is now incorporated in the bill. I am always willing, and I know I speak the sentiment of the northern members of this committee when I say that we are always willing, to contribute everything within our power to the fostering of the agricultural interests of the southern section of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Will my colleague yield to me for a statement?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I voted against the amendment for $500,000 and the amendment for $300,000 because I believed that those amounts were not necessary to do this administrative work. But in view of what has been said here seriously and facetiously, and in view of the fact that had these gentlemen from Mississippi and other Southern States come before the Agricultural Committee and made the statement there that they have made here, I am inclined to believe that the committee, that knows no section and politics, would have increased this appropriation to $250,000, and therefore I am going to vote for this proposition, and I hope the House will agree with me.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it is a very ungracious task to oppose an amendment which is offered in so much good faith and advocated with so great a degree of earnestness, and I certainly could not find it in my heart to do it if I thought that the additional sum asked for were really needed in the work. But I do not believe that the cotton industry in the South will suffer at all from withholding the small additional sum asked for by this amendment.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] remarked that we were spending $300,000 to combat the gypsy moth in New England. If he were debating this question from a sectional standpoint, which I know he is not, I should like to remind him that we balanced that appropriation with $300,000 to combat the cattle tick in the South. And let me remind him of the further fact that while the Federal Treasury expends $300,000 to combat the gypsy moth in the North, the States concerned contribute three times that amount, or $900,000, whereas the States in which the boll weevil exists only contribute about $19,000 to help defray the expense of that work. If gentlemen will appeal to the generosity of their own States to contribute something toward the work, they will, perhaps, get more accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEVER) there were 75 ayes and 88 noes.

Mr. LEVER. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. LEVER and Mr. SCOTT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 88 ayes and 102 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, at the request of a number of gentlemen, I ask unanimous consent that Members who have spoken on any of the amendments to this paragraph be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that unanimous consent of that character can only be given in the House.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read. I think this amendment will be accepted by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 17 and 18, page 18, in place of "$215,155" insert the words "$225,000, of which amount $50,000 shall be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that amendment by striking out the figures mentioned in the amendment and inserting in lieu thereof "$215,150."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that part of the provision in the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana making $50,000 immediately available.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order. Does the Chair understand that he makes the point of order as to the whole amendment or to a portion of it?

Mr. SCOTT. I make the point of order to the whole amendment, because part of it being subject to a point of order all of the amendment falls.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that the point of order is good as to that portion which provides that the money shall be immediately available. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to strike that part out of the amendment and offer it simply at $225,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lines 17 and 18, page 18, in place of the words "two hundred and fifteen thousand one hundred and fifty-five dollars" insert the words "two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars."

Mr. PAYNE. I now move to strike out the amount stated in the amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the words "two hundred and fifteen thousand one hundred and fifty dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend so as to read "$215,150."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANDLER) there were—yeas 72, nays 67.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask where the bill stands now.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph has not been changed. It remains as in the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York was to insert $215,150. If that is true, the gentleman from New York has cut us out of $5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offered an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana. That amendment prevails, but the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana as amended by the gentleman from New York was rejected. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under semiarid or dry-land conditions, $31,730.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 21, page 18, of the bill by striking out the words "thirty-one thousand seven hundred and thirty" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "fifty thousand six hundred and forty-four."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, in support of the amendment which has just been read, I desire to say that the Agricultural Department has established and is now carrying on 14 dry-farm experiment stations, for the purpose of making experiments in the cultivation of soils and the production of crops in the regions where there is neither sufficient rainfall to raise crops nor sufficient water from natural sources for irrigation. These 14 stations supply a territory about 350 miles in width by 1,100 miles in length, a grand total area of about 400,000 square miles. For the purpose of carrying on these highly important experiments last year there was appropriated the very modest sum of $31,760, which in the pending bill is reduced $30, a very microscopic piece of economy, indeed.

A comparison with other features of this bill and a comparison of the bill with that of last year, however, does not indicate the same parsimony in dealing with other branches of the Agricultural Department work; and I say this without any intention of casting any reflection whatever upon the very distinguished gentleman who has the honor of being the sponsor of this bill, because I believe there is no Member of this body who is more heart and soul interested in the great work that is carried on by the Agricultural Department or has a better appreciation of what that work is. But there are some things that the author evidently had to take as they came to him, and this appears to be one of them. I notice, for instance, that while the appropriation for dry-farming experiments in that great section of the West to which he says the people of this country must look for any increase in the area of arable lands has been reduced from $31,760 to $31,730, the Forest Service has been increased from $4,646,200 to $5,043,700. Thirty dollars less for the work of dry-soil crop experimentation and instruction and $397,500 more for the Forest Service!

And here is another interesting item in this bill as going to show the relative difference and importance in some one's mind between these two branches of the government service: There has been appropriated only $31,730 to conduct all of the dry-farming experiment stations in the Agricultural Department, but the sum of $129,420 is proposed to be appropriated for tree culture, which creates a suspicion in my mind that if the late Doctor Pinchot had been divinely commissioned to make two hills of corn grow where only one bunch of soap weed grew before, instead of keeping one tree where it was, the figures might have been slightly different.

But we are not asking, Mr. Chairman, to place the arid prairies upon the same high plane with the timbered mountains. We have selected a more moderate basis in fixing the amount in the pending amendment. It appears from this bill, Mr. Chairman, that the map of the United States is now ornamented with 150 national forests, and every one of these forests carries a separate appropriation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two more. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I notice, furthermore, Mr. Chairman, that 39 of these national forests each carry a larger appropriation than the entire amount provided for the 14 agricultural experiment stations.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not these dry experiment stations have met with any success or are a success?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is my opinion, I will say, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, that they are a decided success.

Mr. COX of Indiana. In what way?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. They are a success in ascertaining the character of crops that can be grown in these semiarid regions where there is neither sufficient rainfall nor sources of water for irrigation. They demonstrate the kind of crop that will grow under such conditions and how the soil ought to be tilled and the crops cultivated to conserve the scant moisture of that region; and I will say to the gentleman that a very large proportion, everything considered—a surprisingly large proportion—of the bulletins gotten out by the Agricultural Department have to do with these experiments, and I will call upon the chairman of the committee, the author of this bill, to bear me out in that statement.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think the men living in that arid country, the practical farmers, know just as much about it as the Government?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then, why not abolish all of this agricultural experiment work?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am asking the gentleman for his opinion upon it. I do not know anything about this dry-farm experimentation work.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If you say the farmer who is taking up an absolutely new agricultural line does not need any instruction, you might better say that the farmer in the older sections of the country, who has been pursuing methods in vogue ever since the dawn of history and dealing with long-known conditions does not need instruction; therefore abolish the Agricultural Department and save all of this money.

Now, I proceed to say, Mr. Chairman, that 39 of these national forests each receive a larger appropriation than the entire 14 dry-farm experiment stations. And I have selected the largest sum allotted to one of these 39 forests, to wit, the sum of $50,644, which is given to the Angles National Forest, in California.

Now, your dry-land farmer is a real conservationist. His very existence depends upon making one drop of water do what 100 drops will do elsewhere, and I thought that asking for his entire field the exact amount given to only one of the 150 national forests as provided in this bill would be illuminating to him. I thought the dry-land farmer would see the point. I thought it would set him to thinking and, in view of a certain contingency that may overtake this amendment in a minute or two, to cussing also. He might be made to see the reason he did not get a little bit more was because there was not anything of that description left; that the national forests required it all. And while the sun would be curing his crops in the bud, he might amuse himself with certain comparative tables of figures that could be furnished him from this agricultural appropriation bill, and to which I have no time to refer at the present moment. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not believe any more important work can be provided for in this bill. You are teaching these people to reclaim an empire. You are teaching them to enlarge the farming area of this country from the only source from which it can be enlarged. I am informed by those in charge of this work down in the Bureau of Plant Industry that the growth of the work itself, the natural growth of the work, would justify and demand an increase, and not a decrease such as is provided for in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It has been suggested that I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I do not care to do so, but I want to appeal to the Members here present to make this increase. I am not criticising the appropriations that have been made to the national forests. The national forests get 40 per cent of the entire appropriation of the agricultural bill, and if the gentlemen want to give them such a proportion as that, let them do so. I am simply referring to these figures for comparative purposes, in the hope that you may see the justice of giving this little additional sum to a work that has already produced results in grain, cereal, and feed growing that are almost incredible to others than the people actually engaged in it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate close in ten minutes, the time to be equally divided.

Mr. NORRIS. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MONDELL. I move to amend by making it fifteen minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I will accept the suggestion that the debate close in fifteen minutes, with the understanding that I may have the last five minutes in which to close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be closed in fifteen minutes on this paragraph and amendments thereto. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], and in doing so I do not intend any criticism of the action of the committee. I am much interested in the experiments proposed, and should have appeared before the committee and asked for an increase of this item had it not been for the fact that I understood the committee was going to insist upon keeping within the estimates. I understand they did so in this case, and that there is a reduction of a few dollars.

There is no more important work, Mr. Chairman, before the Government to-day than that which has to do with that magnificent conservation movement which proposes to show the farmers of America how to grow crops with a minimum of rainfall. They who live in regions of abundant and superabundant rain have conceived the notion that there must be a superabundance of rain in order that crops may be grown profitably, that we must plow through snow in the winter and mud in the summer in order to produce crops. There is no greater error. Many agricultural crops can be produced profitably with a very limited precipitation. At one time 30 inches was considered to be the minimum.

The farmers of the plains proved that crops could be grown with 20 inches of precipitation, and recent experimentation and demonstration have proven that profitable crops of all cereals and many vegetables and fruits can be produced on certain soils with a precipitation as low as 16 inches or even less. The only public lands now open to homestead entry, except those that can be reclaimed by irrigation, are what are known as "dry lands." These lands are the hope of the Nation, so far as new grain-raising lands are concerned. It is highly important that Congress should aid in every way the men who are endeavoring to develop from these flinty soils fruitful fields. They have done a marvelous work with but little aid from the Government. They have gone into a territory where conditions are trying, where, but for their effort, the land is of little value, and they make the land valuable by scientific methods of cultivation.

Dry farming, so called, is a scientific method which will not only make millions of acres of public land, heretofore considered almost worthless, valuable, but these same scientific methods are of very great value to the farmer on the worn-out lands of the East. The same principles that must be adopted in order to make the dry lands of the West productive, if applied to much of the worn-out lands of the South and East, would make them productive. So that the dry-land farming movement is not only a movement and development beneficial to the West, but a movement which will be of very great value to all parts of the country. The appropriations heretofore made have been very small. In my opinion the appropriation ought to be increased, as suggested by the gentleman from Colorado, and I hope that the committee will see fit to recommend the increase.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, there is no other item, in my judgment, in this bill of greater importance than this particular one. We have an undeveloped empire, and it is not developed for the reason that it has been considered in the past as too dry for agricultural purposes. The chairman of the committee, on Saturday last, in the beginning of this discussion, well said that there was very little in view for an increase for the farming operations of this country except by the extension of irrigation and dry farming. Now, these experiments that have been going on in this land for several years have demonstrated that we can raise a crop on less moisture than we used to be able to raise it on in the past, because we understand better the atmospheric and soil conditions under which it is necessary to raise a crop. There is no other place in the entire avenue of the work of the Agricultural Department where its activities can be better used to bring to utilization in the form of farming the millions of acres that heretofore have been considered as practically useless for agricultural purposes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Was the Government the first to institute this dry farming?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has it been tried by various farming people?

Mr. NORRIS. It has been practiced by others outside of the government service. Mr. Campbell, as I understand, was the first man to start it. He has devoted nearly his entire life to the study of this question. He has traveled all over the West, and the only reason the entire country is not convinced thoroughly about what is known as the Campbell system of dry farming is because the people have not had an opportunity to give to the subject the study that it demands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has there been any other system of dry farming discovered than that which is known as the Campbell system?

Mr. NORRIS. I will state to the gentleman from Texas that undoubtedly if there has been any thought to be better discovered it will be used in the experimentations to determine whether it was the best.

Mr. GOULDEN. What class of crops are produced in this way?

Mr. NORRIS. All classes of crops. They have gone on experimenting, and they do this: In some cases they will raise a crop every two years. Mr. Campbell has made important experiments in Arizona, where there was not rainfall enough in a year, if conserved, to raise one crop in a year. We can conserve the moisture in the land for two years, and raise a crop then. It is practically demonstrated at the present time that the moisture in the soil can be conserved. It is being conserved. It is done under different conditions in different places in the country. There is to-day, under this system, in parts of the West and South, a successful method of raising crops upon land that a few years ago would have been considered as absolutely worthless for agricultural purposes. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that in all the domain of activity of agriculture there is no place where it can be put to more practical benefit than in this particular item we are now considering.

It is a mistake to think that all the benefit comes in those sections known as dry-farming sections. The lessons that they have learned there when put to practical use in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and all the Eastern States can be utilized to advantage to raise crops when they are not getting the rain that they ordinarily get. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. I quite agree with all the gentlemen who have spoken in support of this amendment as to the importance of the work that is being done under the appropriation authorized by this paragraph, but I can not agree with them that it is necessary, or even advisable, to increase the amount of that appropriation. It ought to be enough, perhaps, in support of my opinion, to state that the committee reported precisely the figures recommended by the Secretary. This figure is a reduction, as the gentleman from Colorado remarks, of $30 below the amount expended for the same purpose during the current year. If, as he suggests, it is a bit of parsimony to make so small a reduction, it is the department that is responsible for it and not the committee, and if the department believes it is advisable to reduce the appropriation at all, the committee would seem to have little warrant for increasing it.

But, in addition to the justification of the committee which is afforded by the action of the department, I beg to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the work provided for under this paragraph is not all the work of this character that is being done and is authorized by this bill.

The very next paragraph of the bill provides an appropriation of $73,480 for investigations in connection with lands reclaimed under the reclamation act and other areas in the arid and semiarid regions. Now, under the authority of that provision the department is carrying on work which is precisely similar in its character to the work that is being done at the fourteen different stations to which the gentleman from Colorado alluded, and these together make twenty-three distinct points west of the one hundredth meridian where work is now being conducted in the nature of dry-farming experiments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will call the gentleman's attention, by his permission, to the fact that just west of the one hundredth meridian, near the town of Amarillo—in the Texas Panhandle—we have one of these experiment stations, and they are carrying on the very work that the gentleman from Kansas alludes to, and it is of great value to that portion of the country. Farther west, in New Mexico, different conditions prevail. It is higher, drier, and colder there; and I should like very much to see an experimental station somewhere in the eastern portion of New Mexico; I do not think that there is any there.

I should like to see this amendment adopted, so as to extend the work of the dry-farming experimental stations to all portions of the semiarid and arid portions of the West. 'Twenty years ago lands on the plains in my district sold at about $1 per acre and were used only for grazing purposes; now these same lands sell readily from $15 to $30 per acre. These prices are due solely to the valuable crops of grain now raised by improved methods of farming.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado and Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very sorry, but I have only reserved five minutes in which to reply to arguments which consumed fifteen minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I should like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield first to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] for a question only.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that in this next paragraph all that money is utilized by the department in places where the land is under irrigation?

Mr. SCOTT. Not all of it, but a very large part of it is so used. On the reclamation projects they carry on experiments not only to develop the best methods of growing crops on irrigated land, but also to develop the possibility of growing crops on other lands to which the water can not be carried.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the chairman of the committee sure that these reclamation-project stations carry on any dry-farming experiments? If they do I do not know of it.

Mr. SCOTT. It has been so stated before the committee. I am quite sure I am not mistaken about that, and the language of the next paragraph amply warrants it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the language would warrant it, I will admit.

Mr. SCOTT. It says:

And other areas in the arid and semiarid regions.

So that there is available for this work, all told, something over $100,000.

Mr. MONDELL. I am sure that no part of that has ever been used for dry farming on the farms which are situated on reclamation projects.

Mr. SCOTT. My information is that part of it has been. I trust that the committee will vote down the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I must object. We must proceed with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question being taken (on a division demanded by Mr. NORRIS) there were—ayes 27, noes 54.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the methods of growing, harvesting, packing, storing, handling, and shipping fruits and melons, and for experimental shipments of fruits and melons within the United States and to foreign countries, $71,615.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This strikes me as a rather peculiar provision and reaching out very far. In what way or manner does the Government interest itself, and why does it interest itself in the way of packing and shipping fruits and melons? What good does it do along that line?

Mr. SCOTT. For a great many years there were complaints made by the shippers of oranges and lemons and other fruits grown in California and shipped to the eastern markets that a very large percentage was lost. The local shippers and local organizations and local scientists were unable to suggest methods by which this loss might be prevented.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Lost in what way?

Mr. SCOTT. By decay in transportation. Upon the authority of the language carried in this bill, scientists were sent from the Department of Agriculture to California to study the problem; and as a result of their investigations they have succeeded in reducing the loss very materially, to the extent of 25 to 40 per cent. They show the growers how, by more careful methods in picking, by packing in the right way, and by pre-cooling it before shipping the fruit can be transported with insignificant loss.

The result of the work has been extremely valuable to every grower of fruit in California. Similar experiments have been made with reference to the growing and shipping of peaches and other fruits in the Atlantic States. Experiments have been made in carrying fruits, vegetables, and other perishable products to foreign markets.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the agricultural employees and scientists from the Department of Agriculture go to the place where the work is to be done?

Mr. SCOTT. That is precisely what has been done, and the only way in which it could be done.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is this approximately the same sum that was appropriated last year?

Mr. SCOTT. There was appropriated last year $71,360, as against $71,615 this year.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Was all the appropriation of last year used up?

Mr. SCOTT. I have not a statement so closely analyzed as to be able to tell whether the appropriation for this particular project was all used up or not. I assume that it must have been because they are asking this year for more than was asked for last year, although the amount does not increase the total appropriation for this bureau.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman thinks this appropriation comes back dollar for dollar?

Mr. SCOTT. It has been worth millions of dollars, and I do not overstate it, to the fruit growers of the United States.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Ordinarily, I am with the Agricultural Department, but this looks to me like stepping over the line.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think there has been a wiser expenditure or one that has brought better results than this appropriation.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas and electric current, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for rent and repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $309,590, of which amount not less than $265,710 shall be allotted for congressional distribution. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates to Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster-General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the district embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons who names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress, and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided further, That $43,880 of which sum, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used to collect, purchase, test, propagate, and distribute rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions for experiments with reference to their introduction into and cultivation in this country, and same shall not be distributed generally, but shall be used for experimental tests, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experiment stations.

Mr. MOSS and Mr. LEVER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman will recognize first the gentleman from South Carolina, a member of the committee.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it for the purpose of briefly responding to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE] a moment ago, to the effect that in the few remarks which I made I had endeavored to give a sectional or party aspect to the proposition then under consideration.

I am not sure, of course, what impression my statement made on the minds of Members, but I desire to say that if any statement I made gave that impression it certainly did not represent correctly and accurately what I had in mind and wished to convey to the committee.

The contrary is the impression I intended to give. I was trying to let this committee know that the problem of the ravages of the boll weevil was a great national problem, in which every section of the country was concerned, and I want to say further that it is my belief at this moment, as it was at the time I made the statement, that if that side of the House had as thorough, intimate, and close knowledge of the situation in the South as it is affected by the boll weevil; that if the New England States had a monopoly upon a great crop such as the cotton crop of the South is, and if that crop was threatened with absolute destruction by such a pest as the cotton boll weevil, that side, knowing the situation, appreciating the danger, appreciating what it means to the country, what it means to the world in the way of clothing and the like of that, without hesitation would make this appropriation $5,000,000 instead of $215,000. In other words, I was endeavoring to make myself clear that this is a great national problem, which gentlemen on that side of the House, perhaps, did not understand, and could not understand, as well as the gentlemen on this side of the House representing the boll-weevil district; that it was no attempt to go into the Treasury without the justification that the reason for so doing was national rather than a local one.

I want to say this other thing. I have been on the Agricultural Committee about six years. I have never seen any politics injected into that committee. I trust I never shall. The interests of the country, I think, have been fairly treated, as we could see and understand them, and I believe now that if the Republican majority of the committee could understand and did understand the boll-weevil situation as we know it in the South there would be no hesitation on their part in giving us every cent of money we ask to help us meet the ravages of this great pest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKS of New York. Does not the gentleman think that a large percentage of the money carried in this bill is already spent in the South?

Mr. LEVER. I do not.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Except for the inspection of cattle.

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Cut that out and the major portion is spent for the benefit of that section of the country.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from New York this, and this House and the country ought to understand it, that only a very, very small per cent of the $13,000,000 carried in this bill is used, and solely and directly used, in the interests of the farmers. There is but one bureau in the entire Department of Agriculture which, I believe, is doing real effective work whose work deals directly and intimately and solely with the problems of agriculture. Let us take the Bureau of Animal Industry. We are getting but very little of that, as far as we are concerned in the South, and your meat inspection takes $3,000,000 of that appropriation.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Is it not just as important to inspect the meat for the consumption of the southerner as for the northerner or westerner or easterner?

Mr. LEVER. That is true, but I would like to know how many inspectors are in the South doing that work?

Mr. COCKS of New York. There do not happen to be any cattle growers in the South.

Mr. LEVER. And hence we get no benefit from that appropriation.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Yes; but we are giving you the money to try to help you make a cattle business.

Mr. LEVER. You are not giving it to us.

Mr. COCKS of New York. We are spending it down there, and what is the difference?

Mr. LEVER. As I was saying, it is the Bureau of Plant Industry that is dealing more directly with the problems of agriculture than any other bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. LEVER's time was extended for five minutes.]

Mr. LEVER. And we are carrying for that bureau $1,733,000 as against a total appropriation carried in the bill of something over $13,000,000.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Out of that appropriation does not the gentleman think the South is getting a generous share; that is, the appropriation for the Bureau of Plant Industry?

Mr. LEVER. Of course I do; and I make no complaint as to that.

Mr. COCKS of New York. The gentleman states that the committee has always recognized the interest of that country.

Mr. LEVER. Of course, when they could see our wants and understand them. That is the point I made this morning. Another thing, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE] this morning attempted to give the House the impression that the continuance of free-seed distribution was held in this bill because of the request and demand of the southern Members. I want to stand here to deny that proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Let us strike it out altogether.

Mr. LEVER. I am willing to do it, and I will make you a proposition that I am willing to keep. If you will take the money now allowed for the free-seed distribution and apply it to the purposes of meeting the ravages of the boll weevil in the South and for the spread of farm demonstration and farm educational work in the South and throughout the country, I will meet you half way and support the proposition to do away with the distribution of free seeds. The gentleman goes on to say that every grange and every farmers' organization in his district had passed resolutions against the continuance of seed distribution, and it was only out of the great generosity of his heart toward southern Members that he consented in his own conscience and in his conception of his duty to his own people to permit this great robbery of the Government to continue. The House may be curious to know and the gentleman's constituents may be interested also to know that the only bill pending before the Agricultural Committee to-day which looks to the abolition of the present method of distributing garden seed is a bill which has been introduced time and again and fought out on the floor of this House, by a southern man, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will not the gentleman admit that men from other sections have made a record or taken an interest in that proposition?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; and the gentleman from New York has led that fight here time and time again; but I remember, and I want to impress it, that the great war horse of the Republican party, lately retired involuntarily to private life, Col. Pete Hepburn, waged vigorous and eloquent war in this House time and time again in favor of this same free-seed distribution, so that it is neither a sectional nor a partisan question, and the gentleman is wasting his generosity in this matter.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. COLE. Does the gentleman say he will take his share of the appropriation for free seed and devote it to approations for other purposes?

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman think I have a right to do that under the present arrangement?

Mr. COLE. Is that your proposition?

Mr. LEVER. I am perfectly willing, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, to take $265,000 carried in this bill for free seed and appropriate it to meet the boll weevil. Are you willing to do that?

Mr. COLE. No; I am not willing to do that.

Mr. LEVER. Of course not.

Mr. COLE. The gentleman asks us to do everything and he nothing.

Mr. LEVER. Now, I have said this much, and I have said it in the kindliest spirit, because in my service here I do not think I have ever delivered a partisan political speech. I can not speak—as a matter of fact, speaking is not my long suit—but I do not want the impression to go to the country, given by the gentleman from Ohio, I hope unwittingly, that I do in any shape or form indorse the giving of a partisan aspect to a great national problem, one which threatens a great industry in which the entire Union is concerned, and not one section of it. [Applause.]

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which has been sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 20, in line 12, the words "three hundred and nine thousand;" strike out lines 13, 14, and 15 and insert "one hundred thousand;" strike out all of line 25, page 20, after the word "States," on page 31; strike out lines 1 to 25, inclusive, on page 21, and lines 1 to 11, inclusive, on page 22; strike out of lines 12 and 13, page 22, the words "forty-three thousand eight hundred and eighty dollars" and insert "one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do not care to argue this question at length. I will state the effect of it and it is simply this: It will take away from every Member of the House all seed distribution whatever and increase the amount we give the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase new and rare plants and distribute them in different parts of the United States, $100,000 instead of $43,000. It will give the Secretary of Agriculture under this language, for the purpose of introducing new and rare plants and seeds, if it is along that line of industry, $100,000 to expend under his own direction. That is the effect of the amendment, and, as I say, I do not care to argue it further.

As I say, I do not care to argue it. It is merely a plain proposition as to whether or not we are willing to give $100,000 to be used by the Secretary or whether you want to control that money yourselves.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, only a few days ago I read in a certain paper that a voter was asked what he thought of his Congressman, and he replied "Oh, his arguments don't go down, and his seeds don't come up."

I want to say to you if the seeds are properly distributed they will give a great deal of satisfaction. This morning I received a letter in which were inclosed these three beautiful pressed pansies, raised from seeds I sent out, and the sender labeled them, "Faith, hope, and charity." Now, the statement that some Congressmen's arguments do not go down and their seeds do not come up did not originate in my district. My constituents know that my arguments do go down, as in the case of my arguments against ship subsidy, for hundreds of letters and newspaper clippings which I am receiving voice their strong approval of those arguments, while many other letters I have been receiving show that the people appreciate the sending of the seeds. And I do hope, whether you are from the South or North, that you will not object to further seed distribution. There is one proper way of doing this, however. I advertised in every newspaper in my district to the effect that those who really had use for those seeds could have them by applying to me, and I received letters containing 9,000 names, thereby helping out the deficit of the Post-Office Department, and at the same time only those who actually used the seeds received them. If you will all do that, and not send the packages of seed to the different postmasters, who either do not distribute them or else hand them out at the rate of a dozen packages to one person and none to the other, I know that you will get a great deal of satisfaction out of the seed distribution—and perhaps a few extra votes. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman a question. I would like to ask the gentleman a word or two in regard to the seed distribution. As I understood it, he got 9,000 requests for seeds through advertising in the papers.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Yes; in the papers.

Mr. WEISSE. I would like to ask him if it would not be better for the Government to advertise them in every paper in the United States and by tacking upon a billboard in every post-office, and let the people apply to the Member and he send his request to the Department of Agriculture and they fill all the requests?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. It would certainly be easier for the Congressman.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. I am not in favor of taking from the farmers of this country this small token that they now receive from "Uncle Sam" in the way of garden and field seeds. God knows they get little enough from this Government, when you consider how heavily they are taxed to meet its extravagant expenditures. The few seed that they get amounts to but precious little, and all they get for everything is exceedingly small when we consider the vast amount that you wring from the purse of the people of this country year after year, a large portion of which comes out of the farmer in one way and another. Now, if this were a measure to secure something for special interests in this Government, some of the gentlemen on the other side would not make any objection, not at all, but you would be heartily in favor of it. I am not surprised at the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the floor leader on the Republican side, for opposing this legislation that seeks to aid the cotton industry of the South by fighting the boll weevil. This is in keeping with the gentleman's record regarding legislation touching the agricultural interests, and especially cotton. I saw him object to the passage of a measure here that made it a penalty for any employee of the Government to sell information regarding cotton. Since that time, Mr. Chairman, I have known that the gentleman was exceedingly sensitive and had peculiar views on agricultural topics, and that the mention of legislation regarding cotton produced a strange effect upon him. I attribute this to the fact that the gentleman is from New York, where the "bears" produce every year a great crop of hot air and sell it in competition with real cotton, the kind we grow in the South.

Let me say to you gentlemen of the West, we buy our corn and meat from you, and we buy our mules from you, and have been doing so for years; but let me sound in your ears a note of warning. If the boll weevil continues to destroy the cotton crop, and you will not help us destroy the boll weevil—and you have just refused to vote for this little increase—we are going to raise our own stock and our own corn and meat—some are doing it now—and then you will come down to see if you can not help us kill the boll weevil, so that we can go to planting cotton again and buying meat and corn and mules from you. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that debate close on this paragraph and all amendments thereto in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I arise to enter my protest and opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, to place in the Department of Agriculture alone the power to distribute the seed to the people of the country. Some folks think, as was suggested by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin a moment ago, that it is a small thing to distribute seed to the people. I have never yet come to the point where I believed that any service I could render to my people, no matter what it was, was a small service; but, on the contrary, any service, no matter what it is, that needs my attention and causes them to call upon me is a great service and one that ought to be recognized by me, and I am always glad to respond and do cheerfully and promptly what I can for them. I am one that does not believe that I am a lord over the people in any sense, but I am the servant of the people that honored me by selecting me as a Member on the floor of this House, and I am not here on some high pedestal to look down upon them, but I prefer to sit at their feet and look up into their honest and patriotic faces and say to them, "What will thou have me to do?"—and then do it. [Loud applause.]

I believe the seed can be better distributed by Members of Congress than by the department, because they are familiar with their people, and know their wants and necessities; and therefore, being personally acquainted with them, and knowing what they need and desire, they can render better service in this regard than the Department of Agriculture, or even the Secretary of that great department, for whom I have the highest regard and greatest respect, because I believe if there is one man in this country doing a great service to the people, it is the Secretary of Agriculture, the Hon. James Wilson. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Can the gentleman tell me why these gentlemen object to a seed distribution, and do not object to sending out the farmers' bulletins, and franking them? Is it because no one raises farmers' bulletins in competition?

Mr. CANDLER. That question is, of course, an important one and deserving of consideration, but my limited time forbids discussing it now.

Mr. WEISSE. Do you not think it would be cheaper and much better if all of these requests for distribution of seeds were turned over to the Secretary?

Mr. CANDLER. No, sir; I would rather respond to the request of my own constituents than to have the Secretary of Agriculture or anybody else do so. I am better able, in my present position, to respond than anybody else, because I know their wants and desires better.

Mr. WEISSE. Would it not be better for the Secretary to distribute the seed, and then the gentleman could have more time to study legislation?

Mr. CANDLER. I can study legislation as well as distribute the seed. I am industrious and willing to work. [Applause.] I have studied, voted, and spoken upon great and important legislation since I have been here.

Mr. MANN. And you are practically always here, which can not be said of all Members who talk on this question.

Mr. CANDLER. I stay here when legislation is going on. May I appeal to the generosity of the House for one moment, and then that there shall be two minutes for the distinguished chairman of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a minute and a half yet.

Mr. CANDLER. Well, now, in reference to the question propounded by the gentleman from Wisconsin about the seed not coming up, I want to say just this: In my district in the last campaign one of the most beautiful ladies in all Mississippi—and they are as pretty there as they are anywhere in the world—came to me and said that she had planted the seed I sent her, and they came up the first season and matured, and the seed from the matured plant dropped into that fertile soil and made a better and more luxuriant crop the second year than the first. I now appeal to my colleagues to stand by the provision in the bill. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Mississippi thought he would leave me two minutes, but he occupied five; and I would like to have two minutes to close the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that he may have two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the membership of this House, at least those who have been here for some time, do not need to be told what my position on the congressional seed-distribution question has been. I had the privilege of being one of the members of the committee which, in a former Congress, brought in its bill with this provision stricken out; but it was put back by a vote of the House with an increased appropriation, and with so much emphasis that for one I have not had the heart to attempt what I regard as impossible since that time.

And, speaking now as the representative of the committee, I trust this amendment will not prevail, because if a change is to be made in the policy of Congress respecting this matter, I think it is one which should have the careful consideration of the committee. This matter was not brought before the committee while the bill was under consideration. The estimates of the department were reported in the bill because we believed they met, in this particular especially, with the approval of the membership of the House. Therefore no consideration was given to the proposition. I trust that the amendment will be rejected with the understanding that if gentlemen are sufficiently interested in the question in another Congress to appear before the committee and make their plea there for a change in the policy they will gladly be given that opportunity.

Mr. WEISSE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent, as the time on the pending paragraph has been ordered closed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does that mean that debate is closed on the paragraph and amendments thereto?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I have a substitute that I should like to offer for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "congressional distribution," on page 20, line 15, and insert in lieu thereof the words "the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, in addition to the sum of $215,155 heretofore appropriated for that purpose."

Mr. SCOTT. I make the point of order upon that amendment because it seems to me that it relates to a subject upon which the House has just voted and is not germane to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment as a substitute, which, in the opinion of the Chair, is not in the nature of a substitute, but an independent amendment, and would have to wait until the pending amendment was voted on. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. Moss) there were—ayes 32, noes 89.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. SCOTT. I made a point of order on that amendment, and I understood the Chair to sustain it.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time it was not in order. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi was again read.

Mr. SCOTT. To that I make the point of order that it is not germane to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREST SERVICE.

Salaries, Forest Service: One forester, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 clerk, $1,500; 1 clerk, $1,320; 2 clerks, at $1,260 each; 4 clerks, at $1,200 each; 5 clerks, at $1,080 each; 8 clerks, at $1,020 each; 10 clerks, at $960 each; 17 clerks, at $900 each; 4 messengers, at $660 each; 4 messengers, at $360 each; 3 watchmen, at $840 each; in all, $60,200.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, as we have now taken up the subject of forestry, and will probably discuss timber, lumber, and all the various subjects in connection with it, I should like to have read a letter which I have just received describing the cutting of a large tree in Humboldt County, Cal., which produced a large amount of lumber, and which letter contains some very pertinent facts in connection with the lumber industry. I send the letter to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The letter will be read in the time of the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

EEL RIVER VALLEY LUMBER COMPANY,
Newburg, Cal., January 15, 1910.

Hon. W. F. ENGLEBRIGHT,
Congressman First District, California, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed photograph of a large redwood tree was taken on September 5, 1905, on which date the tree was felled on the lands of the Eel River Valley Lumber Company, Humboldt County, Cal., in the presence of about 300 people, who had assembled to see it fall.

This tree grew on top of a ridge dividing two gulches, at an altitude of about 700 feet, and while not as large as many redwood trees which have grown in Humboldt County is one of the largest which has ever been taken off of "hill land," the larger ones growing on the rich bottoms along the rivers.

This tree was what is known as a "stub"—that is, the top of it was broken off, but what was left standing of the trunk was estimated to be 275 feet in height. It is commonly understood amongst lumbermen that a redwood tree which has the top broken off must be more or less rotten in the top, and this tree was no exception to the rule, the top being quite rotten and for a long distance down toward the butt. As much care as was possible was taken in felling this tree, and considering the rough country in which it grew a good "save" was made, there being 162 feet of it saved cleanly.

All redwood trees break in falling, and of course it follows that the rougher the country and the less expert the fellers are the more the tree is broken up. It is the endeavor of both the owners and the "choppers" to save as much as possible of the tree.

Out of the 162 feet saved there were 8 logs sawed, each 20 feet in length, the diameter of the top log being 11 feet. The butt measured 15 feet across one way and 16 feet the other, being not quite round. The top log was quite rotten, there being only a shell around the outside about 1½ feet thick, and the middle all dry rot; the rot extended down 5 logs, each one toward the butt being less rotten and the remaining 3 logs being perfectly sound. A tally was kept of the tree as it was sawed up, and it yielded 47,500 feet of strictly clear first-class lumber and 2,500 feet of inferior grades. It was figured that the lumber from this tree was worth about $1,200 at the mill at the prices current at the time of sawing. Had the tree been perfectly sound for the 162 feet saved it would have sawed out in the neighborhood of 75,000 to 80,000 feet of lumber, and had it been sound considerable more of it would have been saved.

You will note in the photograph that there is a cut in the tree. This is called the "undercut," the bottom of it being sawed in and the upper part chopped. It is chopped in on the back the same way, only to a less extent, and the remaining timber is sawed until it breaks off.

By scientific felling these trees can be felled over an exact spot, and a "lay out" or bed is made for them to fall upon. This bed is made by felling small trees in the place the tree is to fall, and having other logs, etc., cleared away.

This tree had to be quartered in the woods to make the hauling of it on the logging roads possible, and it had to be hauled to the railroad landing, nearly a mile, by means of a wire cable.

This tree is, of course, exceptional in size, especially for hill land. The average size of redwood logs would be between 3 and 4 feet in diameter, sawing out about an average of 1,000 feet board measure each, and 5 logs to the tree, or possibly 6, will be the average. The yield per acre runs in different places from 25,000 feet to 300,000 feet. It would be difficult to establish an average per acre throughout the county, but on our own lands, from exact tallies and surveys, we have averaged 100,000 feet per acre for some seven or eight years.

I am also inclosing a calendar, on which is a copy of the photograph of another log, which may be of interest to you. I would say of same, that while the contents are given, that much waste in sawing would ensue, and that not over two-thirds of the figures given would be realized from the sawing, the waste being fully that much.

Yours, respectfully,

C. W. SEFFENS,
Superintendent Eel River Valley Lumber Company.

A REMARKABLE TREE.

The redwood tree shown above was cut in the logging woods of the Vance Redwood Lumber Company, Humboldt County, Cal. Its diameter at the butt was 16½ feet, and its length about 300 feet. Nine logging cars were required to carry it to the mill, and four and three-fourths days' time required to fell the tree and prepare the logs for transportation to the mill. The dimensions are as follows:

Total length (estimated)	feet	300
Length from butt to first limb	do	150
Diameter of butt	do	16½
Average diameter of logs	do	11.78
Full contents of logs, board measure	do	166,125
Weight of logs, estimated 4½ pounds per foot board measure	pounds	747,563
Bark of tree	inches thick	6

While these dimensions are very large when compared with trees in other parts of the United States, and large even when compared with average redwood timber, this tree is far from the largest ever cut in Humboldt. It is the largest tree, however, of which accurate records have been kept and photos secured.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. In this connection I will say that these trees are not the Sequoia Gigantea, or California big trees, so often spoken of and which are seen by many visitors to California and which are found in the Sierra Nevadas, but these are in a locality tributary to Humboldt Bay, on the California coast, in the midst of extensive redwood forests, where lumbering is carried on to its greatest perfection with a minimum waste of timber.

It is estimated that there are about 470,000 acres of standing redwood timber in this locality, which will average about 100,000 feet per acre, making about 47,000,000,000 feet of redwood timber in that section that can be cut, besides large quantities of pine, fir, spruce, and other timber.

It may be noted that when the redwood trees are cut a new growth sprouts out from the stumps.

The question is asked why these trees grow so large and thrifty in this locality and the answer is found in the marked fertility of the soil and heavy rainfall. The shipments of lumber from Humboldt Bay during the year 1907 was 374,539,400 feet, of a value of $7,702,200, which gives some idea of what practical lumbering is, and this product can be kept up from that locality for the next one hundred and fifty years, and longer if the new growth be taken into proper consideration.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of taking the time of the House to allude to a matter that is directly connected with the paragraph just read and associated with it, and that is the general subject of conservation. I was very glad, indeed, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] this morning called the subject to the attention of the House, for it is a matter that is worthy of being called to the attention of the House once a week. One of the beautiful characteristics of the President is that his messages are concrete and contain the kernel of future legislation, and the House should aid in carrying out his plan as far as is possible.

The bills which follow the message on conservation are five or six in number. One provides for the general classification of the remaining public lands in the United States and Alaska. That bill, in my opinion, is of foremost importance. It has been introduced in the Senate and it is now receiving the attention of the appropriation committee on that side, and when it reaches this House and has been assigned to the committee I have no doubt it will receive immediate attention, and I hope it will become a law before the session closes. It is in line of improved business and lays the foundation for all the rest of the legislation pertaining to the public lands.

There is another bill which pertains to the water-power question, giving them rights of way over public lands, but as I have discussed that heretofore I shall not consume the time of the House to-day.

The next one which I think of provides for the disposal of lands supposed to contain oil, gas, and asphaltum. As a companion bill to that is another one, almost identical in language, for the disposal of the coal of the public domain. My opinion is that whoever drew the bills drew the coal bill first and then struck out the word "coal" and inserted "oil" and "gas" and passed it along as a new bill. Each bill provides for the entry of the mineral wealth and at the same time the entry on the surface for agricultural purposes. I live in a county which produces more mineral oil than any other county in the United States—17,000,000 or 18,000,000 barrels a year. I know something about the physical features of oil development, and I can say to you, with all respect to the President and everyone else interested in the subject, that it is a great mistake to undertake to farm in the midst of scenes like that of the photograph which I hold in my hand, which is a typical oil-field scene. There is a derrick erected, wells are sunk, engines are operated, fire is had in the midst of the operations, and these operations occur on every other acre, and in the end they sink a well in each quadrangle.

So the bill for the entry and taking out of the earth the oil I did not feel at liberty to stand sponsor for, because I knew that I would be ridiculed at home if I introduced a bill which contemplated farming and agricultural operations in the midst of an oil field.

There is another feature of that bill that I desire to call to the attention of the House—two features. First, it calls for a royalty of 15 per cent of the oil produced. I have drawn many leases myself for men leasing from each other, and it was a very rare thing that I drew one for more than 12½ per cent. That is the standard where men drive hard bargains with each other.

I desire to also call the attention of the House to the question whether the Federal Government should change the policy of one hundred and twenty-five years and start in to drive bargains with the people who are developing the natural resources of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I should like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will continue for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, there is still another feature in both the oil and the coals bills that I think is worth still more consideration of Members than this. The bills provide that whenever the Secretary of the Interior believes or finds—I have forgotten the exact words—that the price at which the producers are selling their commodities or their products is unfair he may step in and fix the price. Now, I should like to have that proposition, or contemplated law, sink deep into the minds of gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber. If we have come to the place in national legislation when we are going to attempt to step in and, by law—no; not by law, but by the edict of an executive officer—are going to endeavor to fix the market price of the commodities of this country, then it is time for both the Democratic and the Republican parties to bid farewell to all the traditions of these two political parties and start out on a new course.

I say this with the utmost respect for the President of the United States, because I am satisfied that he never saw any one of the bills before they were prepared and sent to Congress. The bills were prepared in the Geological Survey. While I can not give the name of the gentleman—I have forgotten it—I can find him if they will marshal the forces of the Geological Survey up in a line and let me look them over. I do not disguise my antipathy to that line of legislation. This Republic has no business to get into the matter of fixing the prices of commodities yet a while.

What are the facts with reference to the disposal of oil? Who produces the oil and who buys it? The farmers, the merchants, the bankers, and everybody is an oil producer out in my country except myself, and I got a letter to-day saying that I had just lost a handsome chance. A friend of mine offered me some stock just before I came East. I did not buy, and now they have struck oil. Every time I have bought they did not strike oil. [Laughter.]

Most of the people are engaged in producing oil. Who are the buyers? The Southern Pacific, for its own purposes; the Santa Fe, ditto; the Standard Oil Company, for the manufacture of illuminating oil and liquid asphaltum, and so forth, and remarketing it in the world; and the Union Oil Company, for identically the same purpose. Those four giant corporations are practically the only buyers of oil in California, and they buy it either for their own purposes or to resell and distribute it throughout the world. I mention this because I know that those responsible for the bill entirely misunderstood the oil situation in California or they would not have drawn the bill giving the Secretary power to fix the selling price. They might have given him the power to fix the buying price, but they certainly would not put him in front of the people who are producing the oil and selling it, for they are against a very strong and menacing combination at all times, made up of those four factors.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman object to legislation by which the coal deposits shall be leased instead of sold outright?

Mr. SMITH of California. Well, I do not know very much about coal. I never saw but one or two coal mines, and I did not know what they were until I had got past them. I do object to all of this line of legislation which undertakes to cause the Federal Government to drive hard bargains and make money out of the remaining resources of this country. The East and the Middle West and the West, as far as the Rocky Mountains, had all that nature offered free, and we are entitled to the same thing, not only as a matter of fairness, but as a sound national policy. The Federal Government ought not to be a bargain maker.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman believe it is good policy to enact laws allowing the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior to set aside all laws at will, and thus abrogate our function as lawmaking bodies in relation to the public domain?

Mr. SMITH of California. That refers to the withdrawal of lands without a specific act of Congress. I wish to say in this connection that I very much hope that we will pass the law at this session which will authorize them to do that thing. It has been done for many, many years, time out of mind, again and again, without any specific authority of law. Of course, there is a question of impropriety in it, and the President fully recognizes that, and has stated it time and again in withdrawing land from entry and occupation when there is no specific law authorizing the withdrawal.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not the gentleman from California making it a little broad when he says "from time out of mind" there have been general withdrawals?

Mr. SMITH of California. I can not remember the time when they did not do it. I know following the desert-land act of 1877——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question. I want to ask the gentleman from California if his attention has ever been called to an existing provision of law authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, without cause and without notice, to revoke permits granting rights of way over the public domain, and if he thinks private capital can safely be invested under such provisions of law as that?

Mr. SMITH of California. Well, I do not care to go into a discussion of that, if the gentleman will pardon me for not replying. The law plainly gives the Secretary of the Interior the power to revoke such a permit. Whether he should exercise the power, I am not called upon, I think, nor do I care at this time, to venture an opinion on that point, as I have not the facts with reference to any withdrawal in hand at this moment. I think the law is entirely a bad one and is retarding the development of the power industry in the West, but that is one of those things the President has brought to our attention and has urged us to enact a law that is better than that law. The evil is not in the department, it is in the law, and I hope before the session is over we shall have enacted something on the subject of water power that will be better than the present law on the subject.

I only rose for the purpose of attracting the attention of the House to the principal features of these conservation bills. Now, there is running throughout the country the idea that conservation is a very new thing, but it is not. I mentioned that the other day in my remarks, and I conclude my remarks at this time by saying that true conservation of coal and oil and gas is not to be found in the manner of its production, but in the manner of its consumption. A gentleman in the Geological Survey told me the other day that the scientists say that one of these electric lights represents one-seventh of 1 per cent of the potentiality of the coal that produces it. Now, conservation comes somewhere along the line of the consumption of coal and its development into the useful things of life, and that is true of oil also. It is generally conceded that there is no serious waste in the production of coal; that there is no serious waste in the production of oil, but it is in our imperfect manner of consumption, the care for which, of course, will lie not in legislation, but in inventive genius more than anything else. It will be more profitable in my mind for this Congress to offer a premium of $100,000 or $500,000 for any genius who can devise an engine that will secure 20 per cent of the potentiality of the fuel which it consumes. We can afford to give a half million dollars to any genius who will develop that, because we would thereby save half of our annual fuel consumption, even more than that, three-fourths of it, if we could do that. And along that line lies true conservation. There is no conservation in merely laying a tax upon the producer of either coal, oil, or any other commodity.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall apologize to the House for not talking to the bill, but following the statement of the gentleman from California, a member of the Committee on Public Lands, who has demonstrated to the House that there are some true conservationists on that committee, I do not care to have what he says convey the idea that all members of the committee approve certain features of the so-called "conservation policy" that he appears to approve.

Mr. SMITH of California. I hope I did not convey the idea that any of the committee were in harmony with me.

Mr. MONDELL. I am inclined to the opinion that the measures to which the gentleman referred when carefully examined into by the House would find less support than some of the other measures. To say that any man or any set of men can determine with certainty whether a certain tract of land is mineral, whether it contains oil or not, whether it contains gas or not by a superficial examination of the surface is making a statement that all sensible men know to be ridiculous. It is utterly impossible to fully classify the public lands of the United States as has been suggested, and that has been well understood ever since there was any provision of law for classification.

In the first place, I doubt if the Congress can provide for a classification that will be absolutely final unless the Congress should also say in the law that if we declare land to be mineral, if we declare it to be oil land, if we say it is dry-farm land, if we say it is irrigable land, it shall be sold as such without regard to its actual character. Recently there was entered in my State, under the coal-land law, land which had been classified as agricultural. The entryman knew that it was coal land and was willing to pay the coal-land price. If classification is to be final, that coal land should have passed under an agricultural entry. Classification can not settle, and never will settle, the character of land, and though I stand alone as the only man to say it, I say that the classification that we have had from the beginning is the most scientific classification you can have—the classification of the man who goes upon the land and who proceeds to put it to a certain use and who for a period of years stands to defend his right to the land for that use and purpose against all comers, against the federal agent who comes to pass upon it, against all who may claim it as some other class and attempt to prove their claim. That is real classification, that is literal classification, and it is the only practical classification. You can, of course, classify coal lands with coal cropping on the surface, or geological conditions that clearly or reasonably indicate the existence of coal.

A coal formation can be judged as to its trend and dip and its probable extent, but when you talk about oil and gas and as-phaltum and some of the metaliferous minerals it is utterly impossible for any living man to determine that lands may contain them or, at least, to say to a certainty that certain lands do not contain them, for they have been found where no geologist has ever guessed they existed and where no geologist has ever dared to recommend that men drill. Mineral should not pass under agricultural patent, but lands which contain no indications of mineral are not mineral lands, and no attempt should be made to allow Government agents to guess that lands may contain mineral and on that guess reserve the mineral that may be there but probably is not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so much for classification. Now, with regard to withdrawal. The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior can withdraw lands from entry any time when in their opinion it is necessary to do that in order to prevent the land from being acquired contrary to law.

Mr. PARSONS. Under what law does he make that withdrawal?

Mr. MONDELL. Under what law? Why, under the power to protect the public domain, and whenever at any point he sees or believes or understands that the public domain, or any portion of it, is being taken contrary to law, he not only has the power, but it is his duty, to withdraw such lands.

Mr. MANN. Does it require a withdrawal of land on the part of the Secretary to keep it from being taken contrary to law?

Mr. MONDELL. There have been times in the history of the country when men have gone upon lands in certain districts proposing to take them under certain laws, when there was a good ground for belief that the law under which the land was being taken did not apply to it. Generally you can protect by withholding patents and by holding up proof, but there might be cases, and there have been a very few in the history of the country, where a temporary withdrawal of a small area was necessary for the protection of the public domain. Nobody denies such right of withdrawal, and no one has ever questioned it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The right of withdrawal which has been exercised extensively in the last few years and the right of withdrawal which it is now sought to have Congress approve is the right to withdraw lands from the operation of the law, from being appropriated and taken in accordance with the law.

Mr. PARSONS. If the President thinks it is desirable that stricter legislation can be enacted, should he not temporarily withdraw the land until legislation is enacted, and has he not the same power to do that as to make withdrawals that you admitted he could make? There is no law in any case.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, every acre of the public domain is covered by law. There is not a square inch anywhere to which a law does not apply, and therefore whenever any lands have been withdrawn from entry under the law that applies to them the law is repealed, set aside, abrogated. I say we might quite as well abrogate our functions and say to the President, "You can set aside certain schedules in a tariff bill," as to say that he can repeal the land law at his will and pleasure.

Mr. Chairman, if the President could repeal or suspend the duty on cotton goods at will, if he could repeal or suspend the duties on agricultural products, if he could repeal or suspend the duty on sugar, do we not all of us know that there would be infinitely more clamor to have him do that right now, to-day, than there is for him to exercise any power in withdrawal of public lands?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield a minute?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like, then, to understand the gentleman's position thoroughly, because it is important that the House should. Does he oppose first, last, and all the time the withdrawal by the President of the surface, mineral, or any other part of the land from the present operation of the land laws, so that they can be seized upon by anybody that could get to them first?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, as involved a proposition as that would require more than the remaining minute that I have left. The land laws of the country apply to the public lands of the country. In the main they are wise laws. Just now we charge for coal lands more than the most grasping landlord anywhere in the world charges for like land. To-day it costs you more to buy a piece of timber land from your Uncle Samuel than from the most grasping timber baron on earth; and under these conditions these lands are fairly well protected.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield; I have not the time. The laws are not perfect, but the laws are the laws of Congress, and they are infinitely nearer being perfect than many people have believed. Whenever, in the opinion of the President, the public lands are being appropriated contrary to law, it is his duty to withdraw them; and I leave the matter this way with the House. In my humble opinion we have no more right under our oaths to give to the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior the right, generally, and whenever he sees fit, to set aside the land laws of the country than we have the right to give him the power to repeal a tariff law, to suspend the operation of the white-slave law you passed the other day, or any other statute of Congress. And, further than that, it is not necessary for the protection of the public domain that the President should have such power unless we are to admit that the Executive knows more about what land laws we should have than Congress.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will just withhold a moment. I ask unanimous consent that debate close on this paragraph in five minutes. It has taken a very wide range, very far from the subject of the bill, and I am anxious to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. SCOTT. That debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that all this debate is out of order, and the only way he can get it closed is by unanimous consent for certain gentlemen to talk on this question for a few minutes. I do not wish to talk, and unless the gentleman makes the point of order they can go on talking on every paragraph as it comes up. The better thing to do, I think, would be to allow them to talk about the matter, and when they get through then make the point of order, or else it will run on this way all the afternoon.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have not made the point of order against the gentlemen who have spoken upon ths paragraph because I did not want to appear to be discourteous to them. I feel quite sure that gentlemen interested in this subject will not impose on the good nature of the House, and for the present I will content myself with asking unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. How is the five minutes to be divided?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio had already been recognized. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I have not the slightest disposition to impose myself regarding this or any other question upon the House, but I do submit that there are few questions of more importance than this now confronting this body. The gentleman this morning, for lack of time, because he is always courteous, did not answer my question when I asked him, in response to his declaration that if I wanted certain bills considered I could introduce them myself, which is true. But I sought to ask the chairman of the Public Lands Committee where such bills would go if I did present them. Now, where would they go? Straight to the gentleman's committee, and, under the declaration that the gentleman made this morning, that he does not father bills in this House that he does not believe in, there, I am afraid, they would stay.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield gladly.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman assume that the chairman of the committee—one member of twenty—runs the committee?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not assume that. I only assume that the gentleman has great influence with his own committee.

Now, the gentleman has made two statements to the House to which I want to call particular attention. The first is that the President now has the power to withdraw these lands from entry under the present law, and, second, that it is not wise in this House to give the President that power. How does the gentleman reconcile these two opposing statements?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the gentlemen did not, certainly, understand me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understood the gentleman quite clearly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to make my statement clear?

Mr. DOUGLAS. If you will kindly bear in mind that I have but five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The President can withdraw lands from entry whenever in his opinion the withdrawal is necessary to prevent the lands going into private ownership contrary to law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, the gentleman will admit that the President has expressed some doubt as to whether the present law on that subject is clear and unequivocal.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think he has ever expressed doubt on that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not want to discuss that matter with the gentleman. I submit this: That this question, so far as the conservation of our minerals and water power and timber in the national domain is concerned, it is one of the most important before this House or this country at the present time.

What is the situation? President Roosevelt was in the habit of withdrawing these lands under what he claimed to be his authority to do so. President Taft insists that that right is to some extent doubtful, and he has asked the Congress of the United States to set at rest that doubt, to dispose of it, by squarely giving him this power. That is the reason I put it to the gentleman as to whether he was in favor of giving it to him or not in favor of giving it to him.

Now, I submit that the question before us is this, whether we will say, as any wise judge or any lawyer in fairness, I think, ought to say when a question of policy with relation to a valuable property is in abeyance, that we will hold the matter in statu quo until that policy can be determined. That is, I submit, what we ought to do in reference to the public domain. Pending the question as to how the water power is to be conserved, as to whether the surface of the ground shall be separated from the mineral underneath, upon what terms the minerals shall be leased, and all of these great overshadowing questions, we ought certainly to say to the President of the United States, "Here is a statute which unequivocally gives you the right, pending the settlement of these questions, to withhold these lands from entry and private ownership." I submit that that is the aspect of this question as it stands to-day before Congress, and I further submit that there can be no serious question as to the duty of Congress in that regard.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, are there five minutes remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph is exhausted. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Forest Service: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment and to make and continue investigations and report on forestry, national forests, forest fires, and lumbering, but no part of this appropriation shall be used for any experiment or test made outside the jurisdiction of the United States; to advise the owners of woodlands as to the proper care of the same; to investigate and test American timber and timber trees and their uses, and methods for the preservative treatment of timber; to seek, through investigations and the planting of native and foreign species, suitable trees for the treeless regions; to erect necessary buildings: Provided, That the cost of any building erected shall not exceed $500; to pay all expenses necessary to protect, administer, and improve the national forests; to ascertain the natural conditions upon and utilize the national forests; and the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, permit timber and other forest products cut or removed from the national forests, except the Black Hills National Forest in South Dakota, to be exported from the State, Territory, or the district of Alaska in which said forests are respectively situated: Provided, That the exportation of dead and insect-infested timber only from said Black Hills National Forest shall be allowed until such time as the forester shall certify that the ravages of the destructive insects in said forests are practically checked, but in no case after July 1, 1912; to transport and care for fish and game supplied to stock the national forests or the waters therein; to employ fiscal and other agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in practical forestry and in the administration of national forests, in the city of Washington and elsewhere; to collate, digest, report, and illustrate the results of experiments and investigations made by the Forest Service; to purchase law books to an amount not exceeding $500, necessary supplies, apparatus, and office fixtures, and technical books and technical journals for officers of the Forest Service stationed outside of Washington; to pay freight, express, telephone, and telegraph charges; for electric light and power, fuel, gas, ice, washing towels, and official traveling and other necessary expenses; and for rent in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how many clerks and other employees are employed in the Bureau of Forestry here at the seat of Government and paid from this lump-sum appropriation under the language—

And in the administration of national forests in the city of Washington and elsewhere?

I observe in the first paragraph, under the head of "Forestry Service," there is a specific appropriation and authorization for the employment of a great many clerks; but this language is general here, and the compensation of these clerks employed under this general language must come out of this general appropriation and is fixed at any amount in the discretion of the department.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the salaries of foresters, experts, agents, examiners, and so forth, carried in the lump sum at the date of July 15, 1909, amounted in the aggregate to $286,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer, after the word "follows," in line 6, page 25, the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The clerk read as follows:

On page 25, after the word "follows," in line 6, insert:

Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit in the regular annual estimates for the fiscal year 1912, and anually thereafter, detailed estimates for all clerks, assistants, and other personal services of whatever name and character required for the Forest Service at the seat of government, and after the fiscal year 1911 it shall not be lawful to employ at the seat of government, for or on account of the Forest Service, any clerks, assistants, or other personal service of whatever name or character not specifically appropriated for by Congress in terms specifying the number and rates of compensation of all such employments.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman in charge of the bill will not insist upon the point of order. Unquestionably it is subject to a point of order. I had hoped in offering it that I might get the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to amend this paragraph so that hereafter, or after the fiscal year 1911, the Secretary of Agriculture will be required to submit detailed estimates showing the number of clerks required in the city of Washington in the Forestry Service, and the rate of compensation that they were being paid, so that we might appropriate specifically for them instead of appropriating a lump sum, and then allowing them to employ all the clerks they want to employ here at Washington and pay them any compensation they see fit to pay them. I understood the gentleman to say that during the fiscal year 1909, or up to July 15, 1909, something in the neighborhood of $200,000 was paid for personal services here at the seat of government in that department. Now, that is something that can not occur in any one of the great executive departments of our Government, and we should not allow it in this service.

Mr. MANN. Under the provision which the gentleman offered, would it be possible for the Secretary to have a forestry expert come to Washington during the winter and here work out the results of field work on which he had been engaged?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; it would.

Mr. MANN. How would it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under an express provision of law the head of a department is permitted to bring into the department any field employee temporarily, or for not more than six months at a time, but he must be employed, however, in the particular bureau in which he is engaged in the field. That is the act of 1882. It would not interfere with that service at all or with that provision of law.

Mr. MANN. But this is a subsequent law, and says that no personal assistance shall be rendered in Washington—there is no exception to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. In drawing the amendment I took into consideration the fact that it is frequently necessary for the department to call in an employee from the field for temporary service, and I drew the amendment so that this provision would not interfere with the statute that now allows that to be done.

Mr. MANN. This provision that the gentleman offered is as strong as you could make the English language.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Illinois thinks it would prohibit or prevent that being done, and he can suggest a modification so as to make it certain, I would like to have him do it, because it was not my intention to deprive the department of authority under that provision of bringing in temporarily from the field the employees in the service of that bureau in which they are employed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's provision is this:

It shall not be lawful to employ at the seat of government for or on account of the Forestry Service any clerks, assistants, or other personal service, of whatever name or character, not specifically appropriated for by Congress in terms specifying the number and rates of compensation of such employment.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is almost identical with the language of the act of 1882, under which they are allowed to bring in field employees for temporary service.

Mr. MANN. There is an act which permits that, but the gentleman understands as well as I do that an act of Congress takes effect in accordance with the time when it is passed. An act of Congress now forbidding a certain thing is not overruled by a previous act of Congress permitting that thing to be done.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Illinois must bear in mind that this does not refer to people employed by the bureau. If employed by the bureau and in the field they could be taken back here temporarily, but they could not be continued permanently.

Mr. MANN. But this says:

It shall not be lawful to employ at the seat of government for or on account of Forestry Service any clerks, assistants, or other personal service.

Mr. TAWNEY. That means permanent.

Mr. MANN. It says personal service of whatever name or character. That doesn't seem to me to be permanent service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Substantially that same question arose before the Committee on the Census respecting the employment of clerks a few weeks ago. There is a provision in the census law prohibiting the Director of the Census from employing special agents for clerical work in the office in this city, and the director said that he had taken the opinion of the law officer of the department upon their right to bring special agents in from the field. The law officer decided that the prohibition referred to original employment; that the head of the department might bring special agents in from the field and use them even in clerical positions for temporary service.

Mr. MANN. Is the provision in the census bill in this language?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the provision in the census law is, perhaps, not in that particular language. In the permanent census law we have something like that; but in the temporary census law, the law providing for the decennial census, we have nothing of that kind, because appropriations are of necessity made in a lump sum. We could not incorporate anything like that in the law providing for the decennial census.

Mr. MANN. But you can bring in clerical assistance from the outside; you can bring in men from the field for special work in Washington, and there is no law to inhibit it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; to do clerical work. The law says that they shall not be employed, that special agents who are not classified can not be employed to do clerical work in the office here. That is to prohibit the Director of the Census from evading the civil-service law. But special agents are often brought to do temporary work in the office, and the law officer held that the director had a right to do that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that when we have a permanent service of the magnitude of the service in the Forestry Bureau here at the seat of government, we ought to provide for specific estimates for that service, so that we may appropriate specifically, and I trust the chairman of the committee will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the committee has for several years required the Forest Service, in submitting its estimate, to give a detailed statement of the employees paid under the lump sums and the salary allowed to each one, and on pages 43 and 44 of the estimates this presentation is made under the head of "General expenses," showing as an illustration, "1 associate forester, $3,500; 1 assistant forester, $3,200; 2 assistant foresters, $6,000," and so on, so that the committee is able every year when the estimates are presented to scan the salary roll of the bureau and pass judgment upon the salaries that are paid and the number of clerks and other assistants that are employed. We have believed that this was sufficient to secure economy and careful administration in this bureau. We realize, and the House must remember, that the Forest Service is transacting a tremendous business; that it has jurisdiction over an area of nearly 200,000 square miles; and it must have a large degree of flexibility in its field force in order that the administration may be carried forward in the most efficient and economic way.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this is not intended to affect the field force at all. I grant all that the gentleman says about the necessity for flexibility in the field force. Where we have a permanent force here in the department, it seems to me no one can justify appropriating a lump sum for that clerical service.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, a large number of the employees who are carried on this lump fund do their work part of the time in the field and part of the time in Washington, and there would be grave danger, it seems to me, if we placed them upon the statutory roll (thus providing in effect that they should remain in Washington) of crippling the work of the bureau. I feel compelled to insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A few moments ago there was a discussion on the policy of conservation. I would like to call the attention of the committee to two substantive principles which run through the bills that the administration has drawn in regard to the disposal of the deposits within the public lands. Whether the President can withdraw or not is not so important. He has withdrawn and he will continue to withdraw. The bill to give him that power, therefore, is not so important as is the question of how we shall dispose of the coal and the oil and the asphaltum and the gas and the phosphates on the public lands and of the water-power sites.

The administration has drawn three bills which dispose of those deposits and of the water-power sites. The first is the water-power sites bill, the second is the coal bill, and the third is the bill which provides for the disposal of the phosphates, the asphaltum, the oil, and the gas. The two substantive principles which run through all these bills are these: First, that instead of disposing of the deposits outright, as has been the habit in the past, leases shall be made—that is, the water-power sites shall be leased and the coal deposits shall be leased and all of these deposits shall be leased. I understand that as to coal, the State of Wyoming has coal lands which it leases.

Mr. MONDELL. The State of Wyoming leases one 40-acre tract of coal land, I think, but the gentleman is a good lawyer, and he must recognize the difference between a lease executed by the sovereignty which has police control and police sovereignty and a lease executed by the Federal Government within the borders of a sovereign State, with its question of conflicting police powers and authority.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I know the object of that question is to get me into a discussion of the water-power question, which I am not going to discuss.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, it applies as well to gas and oil.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman claims that the right of the National Government in regard to public lands is simply that of proprietor. If that is so, then the National Government has the right to lease its coal deposits just as the private owner of coal lands in Pennsylvania has the right to lease them. Therefore the first question is, Shall we dispose of them outright, as in the past, or shall we lease them? The second question is, If we lease them, shall we insert in the lease a condition naming the maximum charge that can be made by the lessee for the power, or the coal, or the oil, or the gas, or the asphaltum, or the phosphate? Those are the two important principles involved in these bills.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is not the first question whether, pending the settlemen as to what our policy shall be, we shall retain control of the thing itself, so that if we have a policy we may put the policy in operation on the thing?

Mr. PARSONS. Well, we have retained control——

Mr. MANN. Oh, we have not. The President has now withdrawn from entry a lot of land——

Mr. PARSONS. Well, that is retaining control——

Mr. MANN (continuing). Awaiting a determination of our policy and asks us to withdraw that land by act of Congress pending our determination of what our policy shall be, stating if he does not have the power to continue the withdrawal, if Congress does not give him that authority——

Mr. PARSONS. Well, I understand that for forty years it has been the policy of the President to withdraw the public lands from disposal and——

Mr. MANN. Suppose that it had been the policy for four hundred years and the present President does not think he has authority. Is not that the first question we have to dispose of?

Mr. PARSONS. If it has been the policy for one hundred years, I think we can rest assured he will continue to withdraw whether we give him the power or not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman thinks when the President says he thinks he does not have a certain authority that he will either change his mind to-morrow or do that which he thinks he has no constitutional right to do?

Mr. PARSONS. What the President said was that some question had been made whether he had the right or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to give notice that I shall feel it my duty to raise the point of order hereafter against any debate which is not germane to the bill. I do not wish to be discourteous, but I think gentlemen recognize that if we are to enter upon a discussion of the broad policy of conservation in connection with this bill we may never finish it; and I am sure the House is as anxious as I am to conclude the consideration of this bill. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. DALZELL, as Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the president of the Capital Traction Company, transmitting report for the year ended December 31, 1909 (H. Doc. No. 622)—to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the president of the Georgetown Gaslight Company, transmitting a statement of its business for the year ended December 31, 1909 (H. Doc. No. 623)—to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a statement of documents received and distributed during the calendar year 1909 (H. Doc. No. 619)—to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Civil Service Commission submitting a draft of legislation authorizing an investigation as to a new building for the commission (H. Doc. No. 621)—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the brig Kitty, William Waters, master (H. Doc. No. 620)—to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BOUTELL, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18403) to repeal a portion of section 429 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 361), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. Res. 332) requesting the Secretary of the Interior to furnish the House information relative to lands in the Ozark National Forest, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 359), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred House bill 1209, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 341) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of J. C. Pendleton, accompanied by a report (No. 339), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 1218, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 342) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of the heirs of Henry Diehl, accompanied by a report (No. 340), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 1222, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 343) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of the estate of W. M. Dickinson, deceased, accompanied by a report (No. 341), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 2948, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 344) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of Lillie L. Penrod, sole heir of Mary E. Wycough, deceased, late daughter and heir of Buford H. Neely, deceased, accompanied by a report (No. 342), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 5795, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 345) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of J. W. McConnell, accompanied by a report (No. 343), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 7404, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 346) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of John Henry Edwards, accompanied by a report (No. 344), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 7468, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 347) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of the estate of Lawrence M. Spann, accompanied by a report (No. 345), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 1, 1910.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I am authorized to announce the resignation of Senator THOMPSON, of North Dakota, to take effect to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I present the credentials of Hon. W. E. PURCELL, lately appointed by the governor of the State of North Dakota a Senator to succeed Senator THOMPSON. I ask that the credentials may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The Secretary read the credentials, as follows:

THE STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Executive Department.

John Burke, governor of said State, to WILLIAM E. PURCELL, of Richland County, State of North Dakota, sends greeting:

Reposing especial trust and confidence in your prudence, integrity, and ability, I have appointed you, the said WILLIAM E. PURCELL, Senator for the State of North Dakota, to represent said State in the Senate of the United States, in place of FOUNTAIN L. THOMPSON, resigned.

You are therefore, by these presents, appointed and commissioned Senator as aforesaid.

To have and to hold the said office of Senator, together with all the rights, powers, and emoluments to the said office belonging or by law in anywise appertaining until this commission shall be, by lawful authority, superseded or annulled, or expire by force or reason of any law of this State or of the United States.

This appointment to take effect on and after February 1, 1910, the date upon which Senator THOMPSON'S resignation takes effect.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my name and caused the great seal of the State of North Dakota to be affixed at the capitol, in the city of Bismarck, this 26th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1910.

JOHN BURKE.

By the governor:
ALFRED BLAISDELL,
Secretary of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. PURCELL is present and ready to take the oath of office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Senator appointed will present himself at the desk and take the oath of office.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, from the reading of the credential I notice that it is not addressed to the Senate of the United States or to the Presiding Officer of the Senate, but it is addressed to the individual, notifying him that he has been appointed to a vacancy in the Senate that would occur on the 1st day of February—to-day.

The certificate is unusual. I do not care to make any objection, but I would suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that the matter should lie over until to-morrow, so that we may look into it a little, if he has no objection to that course.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Michigan will not ask that that be done. The announcement is that Mr. PURCELL has been appointed to succeed Senator THOMPSON. That is clearly evidenced by the certificate. That certificate is now filed with the Senate of the United States, and it announces a fact. The resignation of Senator THOMPSON has also been announced to the Senate. Whether the wording of the certificate is such that it is directed to the appointee, giving him notice of the appointment, or whether it is directed to the Senate seems to me to make no difference, so long as it states a fact; and the Senate is now in possession of that fact.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask the Senator what evidence we have outside of the certificate that the person named has resigned? Has the Senate been notified of any resignation?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senate was notified this morning of the resignation of Senator THOMPSON, to take effect to-day.

Mr. BURROWS. In what form?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] so announced.

Mr. BURROWS. I call attention to the certificate. I think it is exceedingly irregular; and I should like to have the matter lie over until to-morrow, if it will make no difference to the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to answer the question he has just asked?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. The announcement of the resignation of Mr. THOMPSON was made by myself a few moments ago, upon his own authority, and at his request. The certificate of Mr. PURCELL, his successor, is made out by the governor of his State and has the broad seal of the State upon it. It may be irregular in form, but it does not at all change the fact.

We are in the habit here of swearing in Senators on credentials which are entirely irregular. A recent case happened under my own direct observation, where the certificate that was presented here differed very much from another certificate to the same effect given to one of the officers of the Senate. The Senate only wants to be possessed of the facts that there is a vacancy, a real vacancy, and that the governor, in pursuance of the power vested in him by the Constitution of the United States, has appointed a successor. The successor is here with that credential; and the informality or irregularity of it does not invalidate the fact.

It has not been the custom, I will submit to my friend from Michigan, for the Senate to keep a Senator out of his seat because of an irregularity when the fact is ascertained, is well known, and is not disputed by anybody. In other words, there is no valid or substantial objection to seating Mr. PURCELL at once, but it is one that simply goes to the form.

I hope the Senator from Michigan will permit this matter to go through as others have gone through before. There may be a little bit of irregularity in the form, but we are informed as to all the facts that are worth considering in such a matter.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I have no purpose to object to the proceeding, but simply to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the certificate is in a very unusual form, not directed to the Senate at all, but to the individual who has been appointed. It seems now, as to the resignation of the Senator whose place is to be filled, that the Senate was notified this morning of the fact that he had resigned.

My request was, for prudential reasons, that we do not make a precedent which might trouble us hereafter, that the matter might lie over until to-morrow morning. But it is for the Senate to take such action as it may see fit.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I was aware when I read over the certificate that it was not in such form as is usual in such cases, but I recalled, when I read it, that it is in exactly the same form as the certificate which was issued to Senator THOMPSON, and which certificate before I presented it to the Senate I showed to the Senator from Michigan, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I had him pass his judgment upon it at that time. While we both agreed that it was irregular, the Senator from Michigan thought there was nothing in it that would need any further consideration. Although he has not had an opportunity to look over this certificate as carefully as he did the other, I wish to say to him now that it is exactly in the same form as the one which was approved by him after going into the matter.

That being the case, Mr. President, I hope that the matter will be passed upon favorably at the present moment.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that the Senator alludes now to a precedent which was a bad one, undoubtedly, in admitting upon the previous certificate, and therefore I have suggested that possibly it would be well to consider this matter before we establish any more bad precedents.

There is no question but that Senator THOMPSON has resigned, and there is no question but that the governor has issued a commission to an individual, without notifying the Senate, to occupy a seat in this body. The only request I made was that the credential might lie over until to-morrow, that we might look into it a little and see that we do not multiply these bad precedents. If the Senate, however, desires to seat Mr. PURCELL this morning, I shall make no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senator appointed will present himself at the desk and take the oath of office.

Mr. PURCELL was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. MCCUMBER; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

REPORT OF CAPITAL TRACTION COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Capital Traction Company for the year ended December 31, 1909 (H. Doc. No. 622), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company for the year ended December 31, 1909 (S. Doc. No. 340), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

GREAT FALLS AND OLD DOMINION COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company for the year ended December 31, 1909 (S. Doc. No. 339), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

MEDICAL COLLEGE OF ALABAMA, OF MOBILE, ALA., V. UNITED STATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of the Medical College of Mobile, Ala., v. United States (S. Doc. No. 341), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by C. R. McKenney, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 19548) prescribing certain provisions and conditions under which bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States may be issued, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Sheridan, Kool, and Dietz, all in the State of Wyoming, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STONE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Gallatin, Ravenswood, Farber, Adrian, Winfield, Clifton Hill, St. Louis, and Franklin County, all in the State of Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, W. Va., which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Charleston Chamber of Commerce recognize that the present conditions of banking are in the main satisfactory; that this chamber views with alarm and apprehension any action looking toward the establishment by the National Congress of a postal savings-bank system; that we look upon such a proposition as looking toward the centralization of the money of the country into the great money centers; that it will entail unnecessary expense upon the part of the Government in the matter of the savings accounts contemplated by this new proposition; and, finally, that we earnestly request our representatives in both branches of Congress to give this matter their most earnest consideration before enlisting themselves in favor of this proposed departure from our system of banking.

Mr. ELKINS presented the petition of Earl A. Henry, of Clifton, W. Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a bureau of mines in the Interior Department, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5836) to amend section 1, chapter 209, of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 27, entitled "An act providing when plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the court," and to provide for the prosecution of writs of error and appeals in forma pauperis, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 152) thereon.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, submitted an adverse report (No. 153) to accompany Senate resolutions Nos. 32, 69, 72, 77, 96, 102, 103, 104, 108, 116, 117, 118, 122, 123, 128, 130, 133, 136, 137, and 139, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to have audited and reported for payment salaries of postmasters who served at post-offices in various States and Territories of the United States between July 1, 1864, and June 30, 1874, heretofore reported adversely by him and indefinitely postponed.

ACCEPTANCE OF STATUE OF GEN. LEWIS WALLACE.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution (S. C. Res. 22) submitted by Mr. BEVERIDGE on the 19th ultimo, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 22.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Gen. Lewis Wallace, presented by the State of Indiana, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Indiana.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure suitable copper-process plates to be bound with these proceedings.

WHITE-SLAVE TRAFFIC.

Mr. LODGE. On the 27th ultimo, by inadvertence, the bill (H. R. 12315) to further regulate interstate and foreign commerce by prohibiting the transportation therein for immoral purposes of women and girls, and for other purposes, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Immigration. The whole subject is under the control of the Committee on Immigration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the purchase of ground in the vicinity of Ashland, Nebr., for a rifle range, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $160,000 for furnishing new post-office, custom-house, and court-house at Cleveland, Ohio, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,144.86 to pay Rankin & Kellogg, being the amount found due them for services as architects in charge of the construction of the court-house and post-office building at Indianapolis, Ind., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19548. An act prescribing certain provisions and conditions under which bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States may be issued, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, be now considered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5876, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Idaho.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with amendments.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be now read for amendment and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the amendments of the committee will be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to inquire what is the parliamentary status of the bill. Is it open to amendment at this time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, and the amendments of the committee are first to be acted upon under the request made by the Senator from Montana. After the committee amendments have been considered, other amendments can be considered of course. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was in section 2, page 2, line 11, before the word "every," to strike out the words "each and," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That every post-office within the United States which is authorized to issue money orders, and such others as the Postmaster-General in his discretion may from time to time designate, are hereby declared to be postal savings-depository offices, to receive deposits from the public and to account for and dispose of the same according to this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 7, line 7, after the words "For the," to strike out "purpose," and insert "purposes," so as to read:

For the purposes of this act the word "Territory," as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 7, line 17, after the words "amount of," to strike out "his or her," and insert "any," so as to read:

That postal savings-depository funds shall be kept separate from other funds by postmasters and other officers and employees of the postal service, who shall be held to the same accountability under their bonds for such funds as for public moneys; and no person connected with the Post-Office Department shall disclose to any person other than the depositor the amount of any deposit, unless directed so to do by the Postmaster-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, page 9, line 1, before the word "improper," to strike out "and;" in line 7, before the word "improper," to strike out "and other," and in line 12, before the word "improper," to strike out "and other," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That postal savings-depository funds are hereby declared to be entitled to all the safeguards provided by law for the protection of public moneys, and all statutes relating to the embezzlement, conversion, improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of postal and money-order funds and the punishments provided for such offenses are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings-depository funds, and all statutes relating to false returns of postal and money-order business, the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, improper use or handling of postal and money-order blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor, with the penalties provided in such statutes, are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings-depository business, and the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, improper use or handling of postal savings-depository blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I move that——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, which I shall do at the proper time when the amendment is in order.

Mr. CARTER. The committee amendments having been disposed of, other amendments are now in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Amendments are now in order. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I desire, without interrupting the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] or interfering with his amendment, to move that when the final vote is taken on this bill it be taken by yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BACON. I object to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is an extraordinary request.

Mr. BACON. That is not the way in which the yeas and nays are to be ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Mr. BACON. I make the point most distinctly.

Mr. CARTER. I presume there will be a call for the yeas and nays——

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. CARTER. And I desire to have the yeas and nays on the bill without any question of doubt.

Mr. BACON. That is all right, when the proepr time comes, but I protest that we have had a precedent of this kind once before, and we saw the way in which it was worked. I protest, as without any warrant of rule or order or parliamentary law, against such a motion as the Senator from Montana now makes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It certainly is.

Mr. CARTER. In the presence of the objection from the Senator, for the purpose of avoiding any discussion on the subject, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BACON. I want to say, in order that I may not be misunderstood, that at the proper time I suppose every Senator would want the yeas and nays ordered upon the passage of this bill. That is something to be done, however, by Senators present when the vote is to be taken.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. I have not had time to put my amendment in proper shape, and I do not desire to offer it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 5, line 15, after the word "banks," it is proposed to strike out the words "subject to public supervision and examination."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I offer this amendment for the reason that in my State we have no law regulating public supervision or examination of banks. I am heartily in favor of this bill as a whole; I believe in its principles; and, with this amendment, shall give it my most cordial support. I trust that the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], having the bill in charge, will agree to the amendment. If not, I desire to discuss it just for a moment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I can not at this time accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, Mr. President, I desire to state that if this bill as presented at this time should become a law, no bank in my State could have the benefits which are supposed to be derived from it except national banks. The provision of the bill to which the amendment is offered is as follows:

SEC. 8. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum.

Mr. President, we have been led to believe by the Senator having in charge this bill that these funds to be collected from the laboring people—the poor people, from the people in the lower walks of life, if you please—would be deposited in any solvent bank, and that, too, in the community from which the funds are collected. It was with amazement that I discovered, upon a careful reading of this bill, that such was not its intent. In those States where there is no bank supervision and public examination this bill, as it is now presented, means that this vast sum of money collected from the laboring people of the State by means of these small deposits shall not be deposited in the local banks of the communities in which they are collected, but, sir, that it shall be deposited only in those banks having public supervision and public examination, which means nothing more nor less than the national banks. Sir, in my State——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS. In a moment. Sir, in my State we have about 20 national banks, and we have something like 300 state banks. The national banks in my State are located in the large cities and larger towns. If this money, collected from the poor people and from their small earnings in my State, is not to be distributed among the smaller banks in the locality from which it is collected, then, sir, I stand here to give it my most vigorous opposition. I say that this bill ought not to pass if this vast sum of money, collected throughout the United States, the blood of commerce, the blood of trade, the blood of this Nation, is to be placed in the hands of the national banks of the country, and by them to be spirited away to Wall street and placed in the granaries of Wall street and with the Wall street money sharks and money grabbers. Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Arkansas agrees that this money should not be deposited in any but solvent banks.

Mr. DAVIS. Ah, Mr. President, certainly I agree to that; and the bill itself safeguards this money by saying that this board of supervisors provided by the bill shall have power to exact security. Then why not say "in any solvent bank?" The securities for these deposits being fixed and regulated by this board itself, why so limit it as that none but national banks can reap the benefit of this vast sum of money that is going to be collected from the American people?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator's amendment evidently contemplates that the bank in which the deposits are to be made shall be a solvent bank.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In addition to providing that security shall be exacted?

Mr. DAVIS. Most certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the bank is not subject to public supervision or examination, how is its solvency to be determined?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in my State, as I have said to the Senator from Utah, we have about 20 national banks and we have about 300 state banks. I challenge that Senator or any other Senator to contest upon this floor that statistics—bank statistics, if you please—do not show that in the State of Arkansas we have had fewer bank failures and fewer bank scandals than in any State in this Union.

The board may determine, the board may examine, the board may regulate, as to the solvency of these banks where the deposits are to be made. Mr. President, I see now as I have never seen before the cloven foot in this bill, introduced in the name of the people, in whose name all public reforms are promulgated and asked to be passed in the interest of the laboring people of the country; but, sir, when you sift it down to its last analysis you find it is in the interest of the national banks of the country and not in the interest of the people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator does not answer my question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator tell us how the solvency of the state banks can be determined unless——

Mr. DAVIS. By rules and regulations promulgated by this board.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By what board?

Mr. DAVIS. The board of trustees that superintends the loaning of this money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think a board of trustees appointed under federal law would inspect the affairs of state banks?

Mr. DAVIS. I am not here, Mr. President, for the purpose of discussing that feature of the bill, which is left to the discretion of the board of trustees and the details to be worked out by them; but I do know, sir, that if the terms of this bill are not changed no state bank in my State can get one dollar of this money. If you want to help the people, if you want to help the little depositor, if you want to help the little bank in the locality from which the money is collected, why do you not accept this amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that the private banks or state banks of the Senator's State object to public supervision and examination?

Mr. DAVIS. There is no law providing for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, would they object if under this bill they could be examined?

Mr. DAVIS. I am not in touch with them; they belong in our State to the high-collared roosters. I belong to the other crowd. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know to whom the "other crowd" has reference.

Mr. DAVIS. The horny-handed, sunburnt sons of toil.

Now, Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, with the general tenor of the bill I am most heartily in sympathy. It encourages frugality among the people; it encourages the spirit of saving; it encourages the spirit of small depositors. Nowhere, I apprehend, in any banking institution could a man go in and deposit 10 cents on a savings account. By the terms of this bill, so artfully drawn, so perfectly honeycombed and sugar-coated, the unwary and unwise are led to believe that because the poor man can buy a postage stamp or a stamp, if you please, indicating that he has deposited 10 cents in this savings fund, that it is for his interest and for his benefit, never dreaming, Mr. President, never believing, never once thinking that his little money can only be deposited with this great cormorant of the public welfare, the national banks of the country.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I do not understand this section correctly, if the Senator is correct in regard to its provisions.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, I should like to be informed.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator may be correct. I agree with the Senator that this money ought to be deposited in any solvent bank, whether State or National.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. But I do not understand that section 8 prevents this money from being deposited in the state banks where there is a law requiring an examination of state banks.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly not.

Mr. CLAY. I thought that all of the States had such laws.

Mr. DAVIS. Mine has not.

Mr. CLAY. My State has most rigid laws in regard to state-bank inspection.

Mr. DAVIS. Then something else would be found here that would knock the state banks out.

Mr. CLAY. Section 8 reads as follows:

SEC. 8. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory, etc.

Under this section, as I understand, any bank, State or National, would have the right to receive these postal savings deposits, provided it was subject to bank-inspection laws in the State.

Mr. DAVIS. I speak, Mr. President, with reference to Arkansas laws. I know nothing of the banking laws of Georgia. If the banking laws of Georgia permit public inspection or public examination by state authorities, then, under the terms of this bill, there might be deposited with the state banks of Georgia some of this money.

Mr. CLAY. That is what I thought.

Mr. DAVIS. But, having discovered this pitfall in this bill, I warn the Senator from Georgia now to watch for other pitfalls as dangerous as the one which I am endeavoring to point out relating to the State from which I hail, the State of Arkansas. I had no idea, sir, that that good-natured, genial, broad-faced, broad-gauged Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] having charge of this bill would for a moment refuse to accept this amendment and let the little State of Arkansas and the little banks situated therein have an equal show to get the money collected in this manner and under this system; but, sir, since he refuses, there must be method in his madness. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Does the Senator object to the passage of a law by the legislature of Arkansas providing inspection of state banks?

Mr. DAVIS. I want the law first passed in Arkansas. Then I am willing to vote for this bill, if I do not discover any other loopholes in it, and to give it my most cordial support.

Mr. CARTER. We expect the cordial support of the Senator, and the more he examines the bill the more fervent will become his advocacy of it. Mr. President, I desire to reach an understanding with the Senator with reference to the significance of this particular part of the bill to which he objects. There may be some other State in the Union that authorizes the creation of state banks and does not provide any supervision for them, but if such be the fact, I am not aware of it. If all the other States have such supervision, Arkansas could readily qualify itself, and probably add somewhat to the confidence of depositors, by providing a system of state inspection and examination of the banks. I think it is beneficial to the banks themselves, at least those that are well conducted, to have the public law require inspection at unexpected times and examination at any time the inspector may think proper. There was no disposition, I will state to the Senator, in providing that the banks should be subject to public inspection to exclude any State or any state bank from its terms.

Mr. DAVIS. I submit to the Senator from Montana what objection could possibly be urged to having the bill so amended that it might read in this way:

That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks in the State or Territory and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood, etc.

What objection could there be to that amendment?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, we desired that the banks receiving these deposits should be subject to public supervision and examination.

Mr. DAVIS. Ah!

Mr. CARTER. That was the desire; and I will say to the Senator that no member of the committee suspected that any State in this country would authorize the creation of a state bank and fail to provide proper inspection and supervision for it.

Mr. DAVIS. I warn the Senate now that when this section of the bill comes before that board of trustees, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Treasury—the board of supervisors that is to manage this great banking institution—when this section 8 comes before that board for their consideration and their construction, I warn the Senate now, sir, that they may place upon it the construction that the national banks alone in this country have the proper public supervision and public examination. The details of this whole matter as to the running of this great financial scheme are left entirely in the hands of this board of trustees. There is no detail worked out in this bill. There are practically no limitations to their power. They may be autocrats in the working out of these details. When they have spoken, sir, there is no power on earth that can reverse their decision.

I see in this bill, sir, a scheme to turn over all of the money collected by means of this legislation into the hands of the national banks of this country. My people are in favor of it, but they do not understand it. When they see the milk in the cocoanut they will understand it. "You can fool all of the people part of the time; you can fool part of the people all the time; but," thank God, "you can not fool all the people all the time." They will soon wake up, and when the construction is put upon this provision that the national banks are to handle this fund, then, I tell you, the people of this Government will rise in their might, and you will call upon the rocks and the hills to hide you from their wrath.

I have no time or patience with the argument that I hear going the rounds of this Chamber that this bill is unconstitutional. Ofttimes, sir, the Constitution is invoked when the rights of the people are involved. "Old Man People," Mr. President, does not get many things from this Government. The drippings from the sanctuary do not generally fall on "Old Man People." They fall on the other fellow. This is a bill, if propertly limited and with proper safeguards thrown around it, that would afford an immeasurable benefit to "Old Man People." Now, I hear the learned and stilted argument made upon this floor, with thunderous tones and deep intonation of voice from the prairie State of Texas, that the bill is unconstitutional, and therefore that the Senator from that State [Mr. BAILEY] will oppose it. I say, sir, that the Constitution is often invoked when the rights of the people are involved. Is there a Senator upon this floor that would pretend for a moment that the chartering of a national bank is constitutional? Is there one? Ah, it was not so considered back in the old days. It was not so considered in the days of our fathers. The Constitution was framed not for the benefit of the very men this bill seeks further to help. Now, when the people ask for relief, when the people ask for a place where they may go and deposit their small earnings from Monday morning until Saturday night, we hear this stilted argument that it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, I say I have no patience or time to discuss such a proposition. I do say that if you want to make this bill effective, if you want the people to love it and respect it, let this money, taken from the hard earnings of the people, be deposited in the small solvent banks in their own communities and not turn it over, sir, into the great channels leading to Wall street through the national banking system.

I have thought, sir, that I would support this bill. I have had many letters from my State. To my constituents alone am I answerable. I have had many letters from the State of Texas, which lies adjoining my State, asking me to support it. But the people of my State do not know that this iniquitous, monstrous provision is in the bill. Sir, I respectfully ask that the Senate shall pause and wait long before it passes this bill without the pending amendment.

Having said thus much, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the amendment may be read.

Mr. KEAN. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 5, line 15, after the word "banks," strike out the words "subject to public supervision and examination."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FOSTER in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], who I understand is sick at home, unable to be present to-day. I therefore reserve my vote.

Mr. FLINT (when the name of Mr. PERKINS was called). I desire to announce that my colleague is unavoidably detained from the Senate, owing to illness.

Mr. JONES (when the name of Mr. PILES was called). I desire to state that my colleague is absent on public business.

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO], and as he is absent from the Senate Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when the name of Mr. SIMMONS was called). I desire to state that my colleague is absent from the Chamber on business of the Senate.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I withheld my vote because I wished to make a statement. While I am thoroughly in favor of state banks having these deposits, I do not think any bank should have them which is not subject to some supervision, and I will vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (after having voted in the negative). I have a standing pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I thought he was present. I note that he has not voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. FLINT. I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent to take a moment to explain my vote.

I am in favor of these deposits being made in both state and national banks; I would not, under any circumstances, vote for a bill which provided that the deposits should be made in national banks and not in state banks. But I can not get my consent to vote for a measure which provides that the deposits shall be made in a bank of which there is no inspection, either state or national. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I desire to transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to my colleague [Mr. PILES], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. He is not here, and I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call is being proceeded with and can not be interrupted.

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—6.

Davis	Hughes	Money	Taylor

NAYS—43.

Bacon	Clay	Foster	Page
Borah	Crawford	Frye	Penrose

Chamberlain	Gore	Paynter	Stone
Clapp	Hale	Perkins	Taliaferro
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston	Piles	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Lorimer	Purcell

So the amendment of Mr. DAVIS was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I refrained from voting on the roll call because, while I approve of the purpose of the amendment, I did not concur in the means proposed for its accomplishment. I shall take occasion during the consideration of the bill to propose an amendment which, I think, will accomplish the end desired and will not be subject to the objections urged against this amendment.

Mr. BACON. I desire now to present an amendment which I will offer at a later time, and ask that it may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert at the conclusion of section 8 the following:

Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any bank receiving such deposits to transfer the same or any part thereof as a deposit to or in any other bank or other institution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer a substitute for section 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers a substitute for section 8 which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 8, as printed in the bill, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 8. That the postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act by any post-office shall be deposited in the bank or banks, whether organized under national or state law, being subject to public supervision and examination, doing business in the city, town, or village in which such post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum. If there is more than one such bank in any such city, town, or village willing to take deposits upon the terms herein prescribed, the same shall be divided among them substantially according to their capital and surplus. If none of the banks in any such city, town, or village is willing to accept the deposits upon such terms, or if there be no bank or banks therein, then the deposits shall be made in a bank or banks of the State or Territory in which the post-office is situated, giving preference to those that are in the same general community as the post-office receiving the funds. The board of trustees shall take from such bank or banks such indemnity bonds as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt repayment of such deposits on demand. At its option any bank may deposit collateral security in lieu of an indemnity bond, such collateral to be subject to the approval of said board. If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, or in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits were received: Provided, That postal savings funds deposited in any State or Territory in which no provision is made by law governing the investment of savings-bank funds may be invested in the same character of securities in such State or Territory as are made the subject of investment of savings-bank funds by the laws of the States of New York or California. Interest and profits accruing from the deposit or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of expenses of administration authorized by the board of trustees and approved by the Postmaster-General and of interest due to postal savings depositors, as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury as part of the postal revenues: Provided, That in the Treasury or with the Treasurer of the United States postal savings funds shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act and not otherwise. For the purposes of this act the word "Territory," as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to present an amendment to section 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 7, after "prescribe," insert:

Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State in which the depositor withdrawing resides, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor resides.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not understand what disposition was made of the other amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. There has been no disposition made of it. I simply asked consent to offer this, so that it may be before the Senate when I discuss the other, because they are really parts of the same amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I should like to ask a question.

Mr. CARTER. As I understand, the first amendment is offered and the second one is presented for the purpose of being printed and considered later.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is entirely as the Senate may determine. I am quite willing to submit my views upon these amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only desire to ask a question at this time, which I think the Senator will be glad to receive. As the amendment was read I understood it to provide that the board might withdraw the money which had been deposited in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of paying depositors. I think we will run against a prohibition on that question:

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

Is it contemplated that we will make an appropriation covering this?

Mr. CUMMINS. In that respect the amendment which I have offered as a substitute for section 8 is in the exact terms of the original bill. However, I think I would have no difficulty in answering that question at the proper time.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may here say to the Senator, I have a note to object to the same provision in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. President, I have intimated that the Senator in charge of the bill would prefer that these amendments which I have just offered be printed and that final action upon them shall be deferred until after they shall have been printed. If he so desires, I shall not object to that course. But I can probably at this time, as well as at any other, state the changes which will be made in the bill if the amendments which I have offered be adopted.

Mr. CARTER. I shall, of course, not insist on the printing of the amendments as a prerequisite to their consideration. I would prefer to have the consideration of the bill proceeded with, and an examination of the amendments can be made when they are printed, after the explanation of the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. These amendments, Mr. President, are in absolute harmony with the spirit of the bill, and they are offered because I believe they better express the purpose which has been avowed now many times with regard to this measure than the provisions of the bill as reported by the committee. It is the intent of the committee, if I understand it correctly, that money collected at the post-offices shall be deposited in the banks of the cities and towns and villages in which those post-offices are situated. We had some discussion upon this general matter a year ago, and I think nearly everybody came to the conclusion that it would be very unwise to take the money that came into these post-offices and transfer it from the community in which it naturally gathered for purposes of trade and commerce to some other community under the operations of the law.

The bill as reported provides that these funds shall be deposited—in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received.

I object to this expression because it is not sufficiently definite. I object to it because the discretion here reposed in the board of trustees could be so exercised as to destroy the purposes and objects of the bill, and I have therefore in the amendment just sent to the desk provided that the money which comes into a post-office shall be deposited in the bank or banks of the city, town, or village in which those offices are located and divided substantially according to capital and surplus.

This specifically arranges the very thing the committee desires to accomplish, and I very earnestly hope, inasmuch as it is necessary that the people shall be satisfied with the measure in order to give it the highest success, that there will be no objection to the substitution of the expression or phraseology which I have used for the language adopted by the committee. It does the very thing which we all, so far as I know, want done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to call his attention——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have just yielded to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I am in full accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa and also, I believe, the understanding of the Senator from Montana. But I want to call attention to section 1 of the bill. It does seem to me that under the wording of that section the board of trutsees can, after the money is deposited in a local bank, withdraw the deposit and invest it as they may see fit, for it says that all regulations for the investment of money deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed by said board of trustees. Then section 8 provides that the money shall be deposited in a local bank in the State or Territory in which the funds are received, and where more than one such bank is available the deposits shall be distributed ratably among the banks, according to the capital and surplus, but there is nothing in the bill which prevents the withdrawal of the deposits from the bank at any time for investment by the board of trustees, for we find that section 8 provides that—

The board of trustees shall take from such bank or banks such indemnity bonds as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt repayment of such deposits on demand.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the money will be deposited in the local banks all right in the different sections of the country; but the bill does not provide that all or any part of it shall remain there any length of time. It appears, under the reading of the bill, that the board of trustees can withdraw the deposits from the banks at any time and invest it in any security that the board may prescribe; thus the money that is deposited in the banks in the different parts of the country can be withdrawn from any section of the country for investment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I ask the permission of the Senator from Iowa to reply to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho first, and then to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to make the suggestion that, so far as I understand this amendment, it makes no provision for country post-offices. It enumerates post-offices doing business in banks in a city, town, or village.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest to the Senator from Idaho if he will read a little further he will find that contingency covered.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is as to another provision. I think the Senator will find that those first six lines do not fully cover country post-offices. There is no provision made, in other words, for deposit within the proximity of those offices, only within the proximity of offices in villages, towns, and cities. I think country post-offices should be mentioned.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is covered by the sentence reading thus:

If none of the banks in such city, town, or village is willing to accept the deposits upon such terms, or if there be no bank or banks therein——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, in such village, city, or town. The omission occurs before that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I observe the omission.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely call attention to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Idaho, and I hope it will be corrected before it is too late.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana for the purpose of answering the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the apprehension of the Senator from Utah seems to be that, while the deposits must be made ratably in local banks, to begin with, immediately after the deposits are made they may be withdrawn and invested under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the board. All sections of the act must, of course, be construed together. The first section fixes upon the board the obligation to make rules and regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of money deposited in postal savings banks, and that language was inserted for the purpose of authorizing and requiring the board to supplement this act with administrative machinery.

It is conceded that under either provision the money would primarily be deposited in the banks in the localities. How would it be taken out of the banks, and for what purpose? If the Senator will turn to that portion of section 8 which deals with investments, which would certainly control in the making of rules and regulations, he will find this sentence:

If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, etc.

The only investment that could be made of these funds outside of deposit in the banks will occur on the occasion of the refusal of a bank to receive deposits.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what I want to call the Senator's attention to. It provides what shall be done if the banks within a certain city refuse to take the money, but that does not have reference to the money that is received by the banks.

Mr. CARTER. I think upon a close reading the Senator will perceive that the only investment in securities which can be made at all is of such moneys as the banks refuse to accept on deposit.

Mr. SMOOT. Not according to the bill, Mr. President, because the bill in section 1 provides that all regulations for the investment of money——

Mr. CARTER. Certainly; subject to the terms of the law.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. No board authorized to make regulations of an administrative character can make a regulation in conflict with the act under which the board is created and under which the regulations or rules are promulgated. This was the intention of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Montana claim that the provision in section 8, read by him just now, applies to the money that is deposited in a bank that will receive it on the terms prescribed?

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly; because the board has naught to do with any money outside depositing the sum in a bank except for the purpose of investing in securities that are prescribed in a general sense in case the money is not received by the bank. That is the only loose money that will be in this transaction subject to investment by the board. That was the intention of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. As I read it, I can not see that the bill so provides.

Mr. CARTER. If there is any question about it, that question should here and now be set at rest, and set at rest permanently and definitely. I do not think there is room for question on the subject, but Senators may differ on the point at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall look it over and offer an amendment covering that point, because I do not believe it to be in the bill. The bill simply provides for the investment of money in securities that is refused by a bank. I believe that the postal funds deposited in any bank can be invested under the provisions of the bill, and in that way the money that is deposited in the banks of Montana or the banks of Iowa or the banks of Utah can be withdrawn by this board of trustees at any time and invested in securities prescribed by them.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to have the Senator carefully inspect the bill, and, if upon mature consideration he adheres to that view, I shall be very glad to look with favor upon any amendment which it may be proper to present to guard against that contingency.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the thought just suggested by the Senator from Utah was expressed by him, I think, yesterday. Since that time I have given the matter a good deal of consideration and I have tried in the amendment I have prepared to meet that weakness in the bill. But it is so important that I agree with the Senator from Montana that if the Senator from Utah will prepare an amendment making that impossible it ought to receive, and will undoubtedly receive, the approval of every friend of the bill.

I referred to one feature of my amendment. I now refer to another. The provision in the committee bill, or the bill of the Senator from Montana, is that not more than 10 per cent, fixed as a maximum, of all the deposits shall be at once transferred to the Treasury of the United States as a fund for the repayment of depositors who seek to withdraw. In the substitute which I have offered that provision is entirely omitted. I am opposed to an arrangement which will take 10 per cent of these deposits and put that proportion of them in the Treasury of the United States. I am opposed to it, first, because if the discretion or power there given be exercised it will be impossible for the Government to earn enough interest upon the remaining 90 per cent to compensate it for the difference between the interest that it pays the depositor and the interest that it receives from the banks; that is to say, the cost of administration must necessarily fall upon the general funds of the United States if 10 per cent be withdrawn from investment.

It is not necessary that there shall be any such provision. These moneys when collected at the post-office are deposited in the banks all over the country. It is not, as it seems to me, the best method to say to each depositor, whether his deposit be $1 or $500, that in order to withdraw the sum he has given to the United States in trust he must make application to the Treasurer of the United States or to the Secretary of the Treasury, and secure from the central point, namely, the capital of the country, a warrant or an order or a check upon the Treasury of the United States for his repayment. It must be obvious to any one who will consider the details of a proposition of this sort that there must be some plan devised that will enable the depositors, when they have a right to withdraw, to withdraw their money without putting in motion so formidable a bit of machinery as communication with the Treasurer of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury would involve.

Therefore I believe that the deposits which are withdrawn in any community from time to time ought to be paid out of the moneys which have been deposited in the banks of that community. You will in that way preserve the general equilibrium, and you will protect the people against the injustice of one portion of the country that does not desire to withdraw its deposits paying the deposits that may be desired to be withdrawn in another portion of the country.

There is no difficulty so far as the banks are concerned. I know this from personal experience. The State of Iowa deposits all her moneys in the banks of the city of Des Moines. She pays all her bills by checks upon these accounts, and she pays many millions of dollars every year simply by drawing a treasurer's check upon the account in the various banks in which our money has been deposited. Nevertheless, the State of Iowa receives not less than 2 per cent from all these banks, and in some instances more than 2 per cent.

The banks understand just as well as Senators can the general movement of these deposits. They know that the deposits will not be depleted to any large extent within any very limited time; and therefore they will be just as ready and just as willing to pay 2½ per cent upon the account, even though it has connected with it the incident of a check upon that account from time to time as though it were invested there permanently, and with the 10 per cent in the Treasury for the purpose of paying for the withdrawal.

I am sure that this bill will be more workable, will receive greater approval, and create more universal satisfaction if the depositors are provided with some way in which to get their money when they desire to withdraw it in their own vicinity than they will if the entire operation is centered in the Treasury at Washington.

Now, I hope very earnestly that these two matters will receive the favorable consideration not only of the committee, but of the Senate, and I hope also that the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will receive like favorable consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid temporarily aside, without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in looking over the amendment as presented by the Senator from Iowa, I notice the following words:

> If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, etc.

I think that simply refers to the money that is offered for deposit to banks and the banks refuse. I shall take pleasure in looking up this matter and suggesting an amendment that will cover this point, for I feel that the Senator from Iowa, and the Senator from Montana as well, desires the money that is deposited in local banks to remain in and to be used in the business of the locality in which the money is deposited. That is what I want, and that is what I want my proposed amendment to cover.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the purpose of the committee in providing for a reserve fund not exceeding 10 per cent was to insure a workable balance, constantly available, at some convenient point for the transaction of daily business. It is improbable, I conceive, that by contract with the banks for time on the deposits, and thus a larger rate of interest, probably, that the trustees would at any time by contract arrangement tie up such an amount of the deposits as to hamper the operations of business.

The ordinary experience elsewhere has been that for many years after the establishment of postal savings banks the funds constantly increase and do not in this incipient stage of growth diminish for many years. After the banks, however, have been in operation long enough to begin to bring forth a class of people with accumulations of $500, $400, or $300, or, as in the case of Great Britain, $3,000, these accumulations lead to outside investment at better rates of interest than the Government pays. Therefore, after a series of years, in times that are propitious for investment, the postal savings deposits may decrease.

They have decreased in Great Britain within the last two years. Business opportunities have been good, and persons desiring to get better rates of interest, having accumulations sufficient to warrant investment, have proceeded to invest outside. In case of panics, however, the fund will rapidly increase. In case of long protracted stress, or what we commonly call "hard times," the funds may decrease because of the necessities of the depositors; but under normal conditions it can be fairly predicted, in the light of experience in all the countries where this kind of legislation has been enacted, that the growth from year to year will be healthy, normal, continuous.

But in the contingency suggested, the withdrawal of deposits, either on account of hard times or extraordinarily good times, it is important that the business be so adjusted in a legal way in the beginning that no abuse of discretion will be permitted to leave the postal savings institution in such a condition as to be unable to meet ordinary daily demands from depositors.

Again, Mr. President, as I took occasion to suggest yesterday, it will be apparent at once to the person who thinks it over that the department can not well keep current checking accounts with the 22,000 banks in which these funds will be deposited. To check out the dollar or two dollars or ten dollars or hundred dollars that may be payable to a man in a remote part of the country will require maintaining at the central point, wherever that may be, some kind of a current checking system and a system of balancing accounts incident to the withdrawal of deposits from day to day. These monthly or weekly or other statements of the banks with such current accounts would in and of themselves become quite cumbersome in the end. Therefore, in the judgment of the committee, it was deemed best for two reasons to have some central fund from which payments could be checked out. The first idea was to insure at all times the presence of such a fund; second, to have the fund available for the purpose of making payments from a central place rather than have accounts with the banks all over the country for ordinary payments.

I think this fund might well be made constantly interest drawing. It need not be an idle fund held in reserve. The phraseology, on the contrary, can be so framed, I conceive, that it would merely constitute an obligation upon the part of these trustees to permanently keep, subject to their order for the repayment of depositors, a certain proportion of this fund.

Now, I confess at once that if all these bank accounts are to become open current accounts this would be unnecessary, but Senators well know that the banks may in season be willing and able and anxious to give a better rate of interest if a stipulated time is allowed within which they may securely hold the deposits. I would not deprive the trustees of the right to thus secure by contract beneficial conditions or an increased increment to the fund.

The Senator's amendment will be printed, and for his consideration in connection with it I suggest that the provision in section 8 of the bill might be amended so as to read as follows, and thus meet his objection:

That said trustees shall maintain a reserve fund in the deposit banks of at least 10 per cent of the total funds deposited in postal savings depositories.

This 10 per cent would draw interest, as all other funds would draw interest, but it would be a fund which the trustees would be required to keep constantly subject to check. In all probability they would keep that sum subject to check in any event, but there can be no difficulty and there should be no objection in Congress acting with particular care in a matter of such great importance. The particular care I think would be exercised by requiring that the working balance should be kept up to a certain standard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator having the bill in charge a question. I notice that the provisions of the bill are made applicable to the district of Alaska, where we have some 30,000 Americans a part of the time, to Porto Rico, which has a very small population, certainly not many Americans, and the Panama Canal Zone, which has a small population; but it does not include the Philippine Islands, where we have 11,000,000 people, and in the large city of Manila a very large American population.

It has occurred to me that there must be some good reason for this, and I would have privately asked the Senator if I had been near him. It of course at first blush looks as though we ought not to deprive the people of the Philippine Islands, whom we are trying to gain over to us by benevolent assimilation, of the privileges of an act of this kind.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it did not include the Philippine Islands for the very cogent reason that the postal savings system has been in operation for several years in the Philippine Islands, under authority of law passed by the Philippine legislature, and the system is working very satisfactorily there now. Such is not the fact with reference to Porto Rico, however, and we therefore thought well to cover Porto Rico and not to include the Philippines, because confusion would result from a conflict of two systems.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator suggest, Mr. President, that the people of Porto Rico and the people of Alaska, under our Constitution and laws, could establish institutions of this kind without submitting them to Congress for indorsement? It occurs to me that it is an anomalous condition that our possessions across the Pacific Ocean can legislate in a matter of this kind, and that we, passing a general law, should not include them in the provisions of this law.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Philippine Islands have their own postal system. The only way in which this system could exist in Porto Rico would be by inheritance, for since the assuming of the sovereignty by the United States no such system could be established, of course, without the consent or previous authority of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am still of the opinion that it is an unfortunate omission; and yet possibly they have a better system than we are providing for the people of the United States. I do not know how that may be; but if the Philippine Islands belong to the United States, as I apprehend they do, it occurs to me that in passing a general statute in which we recognize Porto Rico and Alaska and the Canal Zone, it is a singular omission that the 11,000,000 people of the Philippine Islands should not be included.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has submitted some observations upon the second feature of the amendment that I propose that are well worth consideration, but he did not make any reply to the first feature of the amendment. I hope that I may assume that he will be willing to accept that part of it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Utah and other Senators who have amendments to offer, one of which has been offered for printing by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], it became apparent that it would probably be better to have this amendment printed before being acted upon. I have not read the amendment, and therefore am not in a position to comment upon any part of it, except that which involved the general principle.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had hoped, Mr. President, that we might go forward and dispose of this bill finally this afternoon. The Senate seems to have nothing whatever to do, and we are panting for something to do. I hope that we can go on continuously until we have voted upon the bill.

I was about to suggest, in reply to the Senator from Montana, upon the point that he did raise, that no man can argue this case intelligently, I think, unless he has in his mind a conception of the way in which he expects it to work. My picture of the way in which the plan submitted on behalf of the committee by the Senator from Montana would operate, is this: We shall have in the Treasury at Washington 10 per cent of all the money collected at all post-offices, or some lesser amount. A man in my own State having a deposit of $5 wants to withdraw it. He must in some way find access to the Treasury of the United States; he must in some way reach the trustees who are in charge of this fund. I can imagine no other way than by making an application for the repayment of his deposit. That application must come to Washington, and here be passed on. If passed on affirmatively or favorably, then a warrant or check upon the Treasury is sent to Iowa; and after all this he will be able to get his money. It is my opinion that if this be the system which is to be established by this bill it will be found utterly unworkable.

On the other hand, I have a picture of the way in which the business would be done if my amendment were to prevail; and I describe it as best I can in this way: The postmaster in the city of Des Moines will be all the while in funds, or with authority to draw from the banks of Des Moines the money which is necessary to cash the deposits of any man who may have put his money into the post-office in Des Moines.

The imaginary depositor, instead of sending an application to Washington and securing a warrant upon the reserve fund in the Treasury of the United States, would go to the postmaster of his own town or city, present the evidence of his deposit, and the postmaster would pay his deposit. If I correctly understand the habits of our people, their commercial customs, there is no other way in which a postal savings institution can be successfully operated. Therefore my amendment provides that the money is to be on deposit in the city or town in which the depositor lives or in which the deposit is made; and I assume that this board will make such regulations as will enable the postmaster of that city or town to draw the money or have the money to pay these depositors exactly as he is now equipped with the money to pay the post-office orders which are issued from time to time by the Government. There is no difficulty whatever in the arrangement if he will just keep a clear idea of how it is to work out. I do not attempt to supply the details, and I agree with the committee entirely that we must submit these details to a board of trustees; but I believe that it should be operated in this way, rather than in the manner reported by the committee.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, the question which the Senator from Iowa raises in this amendment is, of course, the serious question in this whole matter. Whoever has attempted to draw such a bill realizes that; but let us, for example, take the picture the Senator has just drawn. As I understand, the Senator is going to permit the postmaster of each town to draw a check on the bank for the amount of anybody's withdrawal.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interpose there?

Mr. BURKETT. I just want to get my grounds right. Of course, the Senator can then explain.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I were the board of trustees, under this bill, that is the plan that I would adopt; but it is not the plan that the board of trustees is compelled to adopt. It has a very wide discretion. The latitude of its powers, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] remarked yesterday, is very great. But I would devise some plan, and my amendment contemplates some plan, which will keep the money in the vicinity and which will also provide a way to get that money out of the bank in which it is deposited back to the depositor whenever the depositor wants to get it back.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, so far as that covers the statement, that proposition is absolutely accurate. Nobody would undertake to argue against that proposition. I understand that the Senator's amendments contains some provision contemplating what he has outlined to us; but what I was going to ask the Senator was this: If, for example, the banks must all the time be ready to pay out the checks of the postmasters of the local communities, this bill provides that they are to pay 2½ per cent interest for the money. If they must hold themselves in readiness to pay these checks of the local postmasters, they must keep a certain fund on hand, and they would not want to pay interest on a fund which they have to keep on hand ready to do business with. What provision would you have in your amendment for that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the question asked by the Senator from Nebraska is entirely a banking question.

Mr. BURKETT. This is all a banking question.

Mr. CUMMINS. When the Government deposits this money in a bank, it of course loses its identity and it is no longer the Government's money, but it is the bank's money. The bank uses that money precisely as it uses the money of any other depositor. The laws of the United States require, and the laws of many States require, a certain reserve in actual cash to be held by the banks in order to meet the demands of their depositors, but these deposits are in no wise different from any other deposits, and the law of reserves would apply to these deposits precisely as to other deposits.

The banks, however, know the general course of business. For instance, take a bank in my own State which has $100,000 on deposit from a country bank. That is a very common thing. It pays 2 per cent or 3 per cent and sometimes 4 per cent upon that deposit, although the country bank can draw every penny of it at any moment that it chooses to do so; but the bank, in taking the deposit and agreeing to pay the interest, reckons upon the continuity of things and upon everything going along in the orderly and usual way. The banks in taking these deposits would know, just as the Senator from Montana has stated, that for years to come deposits would increase every day instead of diminishing. Therefore it would be, as I think, no obstacle in the way of investment to accompany the investment with the privilege of checking upon it, even though the interest of 2½ per cent is required. Have I answered the question of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BURKETT. I think the Senator has covered the ground. There is, however, another question which occurs to me. I will say to the Senator that I tried to work out some way by which a depositor could get his money a little sooner than by sending his application to Washington and having it returned to him. I have been a great deal interested in the suggestion which has been made and which has developed under the discussion which has been had here during the last year of the zone system; that is, for the purposes of the working of this proposed law having some place closer to every community than Washington would be.

I realize the importance of that. But how is the Senator going to guard it or going to make it safe? What provision does he contemplate for making it safe to grant a postmaster in every town in this country the authority to draw checks without any audit system in advance or without any way of checking him up, such checks being virtually orders on the Treasury and paid in advance before they get to the Treasury? What check have you got on the postmasters of this country? Is it not, in short, too big a risk to take with so many postmasters, when there is not any way that you can get bonds in advance? If a postmaster would start to go wrong, he could draw an amount much in excess of any bond that he might have given. On the other hand, if you contemplate something of that kind and undertake to require a bond to cover it, you would necessarily have to make it excessively large. It seems to me that is a contingency for which there ought to be some provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there never has been a plan devised by which a man could eat his cake and keep it, too. You can not go into a business enterprise of this sort without incurring some risk. Every time the Government enlarges its functions it incurs some risk. I do not pretend that the plan I have suggested, nor do I believe that any plan that can be suggested, will exclude all risk; but we have never lost largely by reason of the power of postmasters to issue money orders.

Mr. BURKETT. We never gave to postmasters or to any other officers this power, so far as I can recall. We never gave any officer of the Government the authority contemplated by the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is quite true, for this business is a different kind of business. We have given officers much greater power than is involved in this case. By the bill reported by the committee we are giving the board of trustees power over 10 per cent of this fund. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] might just as well ask, "Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney-General, and the Postmaster-General should combine together for the purpose of stealing 10 per cent, we will say, of $600,000,000." That is rather an impossible supposition, but it might be done. I do not think, however, that the danger of a little loss here and there is any answer to the equity of a proposition like this. If you are going to take the money of these depositors and lock it up so that it will require a lawyer to assist the depositor every time he desires to draw a little of the money which he has committed to the care of the Government, then you might just as well abandon the whole proposition; but if you are going to make it fairly easy for the depositor—I do not mean to give him free rein—but if you are going to make it fairly easy for the depositor to retake his money, then somebody will have to be trusted in that operation, because you can not make it easy for the depositor to withdraw his money and surround the transaction with all the safeguards that are possible to be put around public funds. I think the amendment that I have suggested, while it does not require any such plan as I have pictured in my own mind as possible—I can conceive of others a great deal more strict and stringent—does give the board an opportunity to make an arrangement that will enable the depositor to be dealt with in some fair and reasonable way in harmony with ordinary business transactions.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, since last speaking on this matter I have looked over the amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa, and I observe that the amendment reads:

That the postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act by any post-office shall be deposited in the bank or banks—

I will ask if the Senator has any objection to the word "solvent?"

Mr. CUMMINS. None whatever. I think it is a little imputation upon both the State and the Nation to put it in, for banks that are subject to supervision and examination and are doing business are supposed to be solvent, but I have no objection in the world to putting the word "solvent" in my amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Then I suggest to the Senator that in lieu of the word "village," at the close of his enumeration of places—the amendment reads "such city, town, or village"—the word "neighborhood" be used, so that it would comprehend all communities that would not be classified as either cities, towns, or villages.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would have no serious objection to that, although I used the word "village" because it is the name given to an unincorporated community in our part of the country, and I assume that is true in a great many parts of the country; but I have no objection to using the word "neighborhood" there.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the Senator if he would object seriously to a proposal requiring that the board shall provide for the maintenance of a reserve fund or a working balance in the bank?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I would not. I want it in the banks, but I want it to bear interest.

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I look upon the whole fund as a working fund.

Mr. CARTER. I think that the balance ought to be "at least 10 per cent" instead of "not more than 10 per cent."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean by "working balance" a balance that does not bear interest?

Mr. CARTER. Not at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator means a balance that is subject to check?

Mr. CARTER. A balance subject to check.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to make that change.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me make an inquiry. The balance subject to check would be in the banks and not in the National Treasury?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. In the banks, of course. The suggestion is made for the reason heretofore stated that at times, for instance, during the period when the crops are being moved, a bank would be willing and could well afford to pay more interest for three months' money or six months' money than it could on daily balances, and I think the board ought to be authorized to make arrangements at stipulated times, but not so as to leave the fund without a daily working balance subject to check. That is the purpose of the amendment; and with that change I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to make an inquiry. Is it proposed that the Senator in charge of the bill may accept an amendment, and that then it takes status as though it had been voted upon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. CARTER. This was rather a colloquial affair and was a discussion somewhat at random. There was no proposition made to crowd the matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not know whether it was intended for a general statement or not. Of course, we would not want an amendment accepted and thus assume a status as though it had been voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire whether it is the intention of the Senator from Montana to further press this bill to-day? If not, I should like to have it laid aside.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think it is quite obvious that the amendments which have been presented to-day should be printed in order that they may be fully and fairly considered. I wish, however, that all Senators having amendments to offer would offer them at this time, so that they may be given some consideration previous to the moment when we are called upon to act on them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in reply to that suggestion, I would say that under the present condition of affairs it is not practicable to know what you desire or to what you should direct your amendment. Amendments, in the judgment of all Senators, may become necessary or advisable after certain other amendments have been adopted; but it is not possible to anticipate every phase that this bill will present.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I am, of course, as all Senators are, anxious that due consideration shall be given this bill and all amendments presented to it. At the same time, I am extremely anxious, as I doubt not other Senators are, to have a vote taken on the bill at no distant day; and, in order to avoid the necessity of pressing this matter to the inconvenience of Senators, I will ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on the bill and all amendments then pending on next Monday at 4 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought not to ask that, in view of the fact that the Senate is so thin this afternoon. I think the Senator had better ask it to-morrow morning, for instance.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is lacking in quantity is made up in quality.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, undoubtedly; but I should myself have to object to that request this afternoon.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I desire that the unanimous consent should be the unanimous consent of the Senate; and if, in the judgment of any Senator, there would more likely be a full expression to-morrow morning, I will not press the request now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know of two Senators who desire to speak to the bill. Neither of those Senators is present this afternoon. I do not know whether or not it would inconvenience them if the Senator's request were granted this afternoon. So I think the Senator had better let it go over.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the request at this time, and state that I will present the request to-morrow morning when the bill is brought up for consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not in the least want to interfere with the management of this bill upon the part of the Senator from Montana, for I know he will forward it just as rapidly as he can. I, however, should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would a motion to make this bill the unfinished business, subject to the rights of the bill that is at the present time the unfinished business, be in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill can be made a special order for a given time by the Senate, subject to what is the special order now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand perfectly the propriety of postponing the bill to give all who have a desire to offer amendments to it or all who desire to speak upon it an opportunity to do so, but it seems to me that we ought to proceed with the bill, after giving due notice, until it is disposed of. In order, therefore, to test the validity, at least, of my view, I move that this bill be made the unfinished business of the Senate, subject to the rights of the bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the District of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. And also appropriation bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it seems to me that we can not have two bills the unfinished business at the same time. I have never known anything like that in the Senate. I have known when the unfinished business was on the calendar to have a special order that a bill might be taken up at a certain time, subject, of course, to the unfinished business, and ordinarily to appropriation bills, but that was by unanimous consent.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to appeal to the Senator from Montana not to unduly crowd this bill. We have given it fair consideration. I do not think there is any disposition to unfairly obstruct it—I certainly have no such thought in my mind—but it has been here only two or three days, and the Senator has had most of the time for its consideration. I understand that the Senator having in charge the unfinished business is quite willing to lay that aside from day to day to have this bill considered, and I think we shall come to a vote before long on this bill if the Senator does not undertake to commit us to voting upon it at any given day or at any given hour.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I have no disposition to unduly press the consideration of the bill. At the same time, I reiterate the announcement of my earnest desire to have a vote on the bill within a reasonable time. A motion was not made to displace the unfinished business and to make this bill the unfinished business because of the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], who has charge of the unfinished business. That Senator, before departing from the city, stated to me that if the unfinished business should not be disturbed in his absence he would make arrangements to have it laid aside temporarily from time to time so that this bill might be considered from day to day. I have accepted that suggestion, and will not make the motion, after the close of morning business, to proceed to the consideration of this bill unless unanimous consent is denied, in which event I will feel constrained to make the motion; and that motion, if carried, will of course displace the unfinished business.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will until 2 o'clock. It would not permanently displace the unfinished business if the motion were made in the morning hour.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that, but after the hour of 2 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just an additional word, and then I will yield. I feel sure that if the Senator from Montana is patient, as he usually is—and the Senator has been here a long time and knows that we have not ordinarily disposed of bills of this magnitude in two or three days—I feel sure that, if the Senator remains patient, he will have no occasion to find fault with any of us who have some doubts as to some features of this bill. I think we ought to have a reasonable time to examine it, to look into it, and perhaps to inquire of our constituents as to how they feel about it, and then when we get around to it, which will be in the near future, I am confident we will vote upon it. I think the Senator will agree that that is the proper course to pursue.

Mr. CARTER. I accept in perfect good faith the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire and shall of course not insist unduly on the disposition of this bill with immature consideration, but hope still that a vote will be taken in the near future.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question. He said yesterday, if I correctly understood him, that the bill as it had been framed by the committee would restrict the function of the Government in handling these deposits. What I desire to know of the Senator from Montana is whether the Government has more than two or three functions that it can perform in connection with this fund? First, it may receive it and obligate itself to pay interest upon it. Second, it shall deposit it in a local bank, preferably where the fund is accumulated. That is the requirement of the bill, as I understand, and is not left to regulation by a board merely. Third, in the event that it is unable to secure a satisfactory local depository it may invest it. Now, what latitude has the board of trustees in the matter of investment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his motion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not yet done so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desired to know.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to say a word.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to say just now that I do not desire that the Senator from Montana shall be held responsible—there were some remarks made which seemed to hold him responsible—for my desire to consider this bill, not to hasten the bill.

Of course, it will take two or three weeks; but I believe we ought to go forward with it with reasonable dispatch until we finish it.

Mr. CARTER. My recollection is that the Senator from New Hampshire suggested that, under the rules and in accordance with the procedure of the Senate, it is impracticable to make two bills the unfinished business—one the unfinished business and the other the unfinished business in a qualified sense. Upon reflection I think it would be unwise to make this bill subject to any other bill. The rules of the Senate give the right of way here to appropriation bills and other bills of public character that require prompt attention when presented. But if by the action of the Senate this bill should be made subject to the Alaska bill, I think that action would preclude a motion to be hereafter made, after the hour of 2 o'clock, to make this bill the unfinished business, in preference to the Alaska bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CARTER. Now, a situation may arise where such a motion will be desirable, and that situation could well arise if the Alaska bill was before the Senate and unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of this bill was denied. A motion to proceed with the consideration of this bill would, of course, if agreed to, displace the Alaska bill; and we do not wish to be restrained in that particular.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not understand that the Senate, in terms, makes any bill the unfinished business. The unfinished business arises by operation of the rules of this body, and a motion to make a bill the unfinished business is not in order. When a bill is taken up after 2 o'clock by a vote, it becomes the unfinished business of the Senate; and if it is not concluded upon the day on which it is taken up, it is the unfinished business by operation of the rules of the Senate, and there can be but one bill in that position at a time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Idaho to make a point of order against my motion?

Mr. HEYBURN. That this bill be made the unfinished business? Yes. It is not in order to make such a motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for a ruling.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Idaho to make the point of order. Does the Senator make that point of order?

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator could not possibly have so understood, because I have not done so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the motion be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Iowa is that the postal savings-bank bill be made the unfinished business, subject to the Alaska bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I raise the point of order. We do not make the unfinished business in that way.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Georgia can not be heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the clerk—the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the order was made—that the Alaska bill was made the unfinished business not by operation of the rules, but by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. By a vote of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. It may have been so worded erroneously, but the motion was to proceed to the consideration of the bill, and that motion having been agreed to, after 2 o'clock the bill became, by operation of the rules, the unfinished business, and it was not because of any motion to make it the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was simply stating the information received from the clerk. The present occupant of the chair was not here when that order was made. The RECORD will show whether the clerks are correct or not.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has stated the rule with absolute correctness. The usual procedure is to move to take up a certain bill, and, as stated by him, if upon adjournment that bill has not been disposed of, and no other bill has been taken up in its place, it is by operation of the rule the unfinished business when the hour of 2 o'clock again arrives on the succeeding session of the Senate. I do not think there is any correct motion to the effect that anything be made the unfinished business. It is the unfinished business if the Senate enters upon its consideration and does not displace it, and the usual way in which that which is the unfinished business is displaced is simply by agreeing to a motion to take up another bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. After 2 o'clock.

Mr. BACON. When that is done it ceases to be the unfinished business, although there may have been no motion couched in that language. I do not think there can be any question about the correctness of that statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Submitting to parliamentary knowledge that I am sure is superior to my own, and suggesting that I made the motion simply to get the bill along and to insure its disposition some time during the present session, I withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa withdraws the motion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, I should like the Senator from Montana to answer my question.

Mr. CARTER. It was quite lengthy, and the infirmities of memory may not allow me to cover all of the points raised. As I recall, the Senator stated that the Government had but few functions to perform with respect to this fund—first, to receive the deposits; second, to deposit the money in banks in the neighborhood; and, finally, to invest it. Aside from the safeguarding of the funds and the providing of the machinery, the Senator has stated the substance of the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then it is not contemplated that the board of trustees will by regulations invade that field at all?

Mr. CARTER. Under the bill the board of trustees can invest only as prescribed. If the banks in any locality or State refuse to receive the deposits on the terms prescribed, if they fail or refuse to give the security, or if they decline to pay the rate of interest, then the board of trustees may deposit the money with the treasurer of the board, the Treasurer of the United States being ex officio the treasurer of the board, and the money thus deposited with the treasurer resulting from the failure or refusal of the banks to accept it may be invested in securities of the United States or in approved savings-banks investments of the respective States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then that puts us in this situation: If in any community the banks should for any reason feel that they have sufficient funds to meet all ordinary demands they will simply refuse to bid for this money, and if they do, the money is to be sent out of the community, deposited in Washington; and to just that extent the local community is to become more dependent upon the regularly constituted local bank.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Michigan must take into consideration the fact that the refusal of the money by the bank in the neighborhood, town, or county does not authorize the board to invest it in government securities. The refusal must extend to the State or the Territory, and of course if the banks in the State of New York, for instance, will not receive and pay interest upon the postal deposits received in that State, then the board of trustees may buy Panama bonds or any other bonds they can buy or think proper to buy in the interest of the fund. That is for the purpose of avoiding the loss of interest.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, we find ourselves in this situation: We are seeking to establish competition in the banking business——

Mr. CARTER. Who is the other fellow?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are seeking to establish at least a new system whereby the man with excess money may put it in the Government's possession—money that would probably be otherwise gathered and put into local enterprises if it were not for this provision.

I know of instances in the last stringency where thousands upon thousands of dollars were invested in postal money orders, not drawing any interest at all, because the people thought that the money was more secure with the Government than in the banks. But, alas, we now propose to go into partnership with the banks by the terms of this bill. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of fencing in the Senate over this bill by the opponents and the advocates of it; fencing evidently for time or for advantage or for some other reason. We may as well come directly to the merits of the proposition before us and determine whether the United States Government shall be forced into practical partnership with the banking interests of the country. If we take the money in at a post-office, why not return it to the depositor through the same agency and make it indeed a government function?

I do not believe it will be satisfactory to introduce any other intermediary. The Government can not afford to delay repayment; lack of funds would be no excuse under such a trusteeship, and this money must not be employed in general banking. It must be wisely and securely placed within easy reach of the depositor and returned promptly on demand; otherwise the Government will be blamed and the very foundation of all confidence destroyed. In England more than 11,000,000 people patronize it; in Japan more than 8,000,000 people; in France more than 6,000,000 people, with millions upon millions of money to their credit, and if the same situation follows the establishment of the postal savings bank here millions of our own countrymen will demand of the Government that they shall make good these deposits as their necessities require. The Government may some time be called upon to augment their reserves for the purpose of meeting that situation. It seems to me it raises a very great question of public policy as to how far the Government ought to go into partnership with the banks in this matter.

I think this will grow to be a very large fund. I would not, under any circumstances, vote to create a board and give it the power to say how and where these funds shall be deposited or the rate of interest that shall be paid, especially in view of the fact that it would be entirely political, frequently changed, and subject to geographical and sectional influences.

Is the Post-Office Department, that has never been run at a profit, always honeycombed with political bias, to be trusted with the additional responsibility of finding investment for hundreds of millions of dollars? No. Let us fix the conditions in the law, if at all, so that every citizen may understand them and know exactly the conditions governing the relationship. I do not say that I shall oppose the bill. I only say that it is serious and of great magnitude and smacks very largely of paternalism, which, if carried much further, may destroy the initiative of the individual, which has done so much to raise the standard of our citizenship in the eyes of the world.

Mr. President, I am anxious to see the bill carefully considered, and hope that if it is passed it will be advantageous to the country. But if we should see more harm in it than good, if it would operate at any time to inflame the people against their Government or cause them to doubt its stability, then it is of such serious magnitude as to challenge the utmost scrutiny at the hands of Senators.

This is the time above all others when the Senate, resting on its oars, if it ever does, should consider such a proposition as this. By and by we will have other important questions to settle. The House of Representatives is busily engaged on the supply bills that will come to us very soon. When they come, we will not have so much time to give to the consideration of this question and will be asked to pass it under whip and spur. I hope it will be considered now and the amendments offered.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana if the Senator from Michigan is not in error when he suggests that this bill as it is proposed will place in the hands of any board, political or otherwise, the investment of funds? The funds are not to be invested; they are to be deposited in the banks, according to the specific provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Providing the banks desire the deposits. If the banks should decline the deposits, the money must be held indefinitely until it has been invested.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator think that under the provisions of the bill the deposits would be refused by the banks of any State in the Union?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope not, Mr. President, and yet there are times when banks are not anxious to pay for money on deposit. There are banks in the country that are very prosperous which do not pay any interest at all on deposits.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I think I am safe in saying there is not a bank in my State, outside of savings banks, that pays interest on deposits. No national bank in New Hampshire pays interest. I have no idea they would accept this money.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The reason I interrogated the Senator from Montana as to the uses to which this fund could be applied under the bill was because I understood the fund accumulated would go directly to the banks in the community, both State and National, and remain with them as a permanent fund until the depositor asked for its return. I can see an advantage in a permanent deposit of that kind which remains practically unimpaired for years, and believe the banks can afford to pay 2 or 2½ per cent on it, because they can count upon it from day to day.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that I believe this bill allows the board to invest every dollar of the money, not only the money that is refused to be taken by the banks, but every dollar deposited in any bank in this country. The board of trustees have a right to invest it as prescribed by them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do you mean to withdraw it?

Mr. SMOOT. To withdraw it from any bank in the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And reinvest it?

Mr. SMOOT. Transfer it to any part of the country and reinvest it in securities prescribed by the board.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that is the case, I would not vote for it under any consideration. I would not lodge with any political board the power to deprive a thrifty community of the use of the accumulations and savings of its own citizens. This was my objection to the bill reported last year, and I then urged that its scope should be broadened so that communities would not be discriminated against, so that the savings might be deposited in state or national banks, thus insuring their retention in the neighborhood where raised.

Mr. CARTER. That does not happen to be the case. I think the Senator from Utah has forgotten that the suggestion was made that he prepare any amendment he thought fit to forestall any such operation as he thinks possible under the phraseology of this bill. The committee have no such thought. They undertook to guard against the identical thing the Senator suggests as being feasible under the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to suggest to the Senator from Montana that I spoke of it again on account of the fact that the Senator from Michigan was not present at our former discussion, and he in his remarks confines the money that could be transferred from one section to another to the money that was refused by the banks, whereas I claim that under this bill the whole of the money can be transferred from one section to the other.

It is true that the Senator from Montana claims that that is not the intention of the committee, and it is also true that he asked that I prepare an amendment to make this point more specific, and that I intend to do. But I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact, as I saw it, and as I understand the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. I rose to bring out the very point that the Senator from Montana is emphasizing. The Senator from Utah is making the objection that he made some time since, in the earlier part of the afternoon, as to which the Senator from Montana said that if the provisions did admit of the transfer as suggested by the Senator from Utah, he himself wanted it corrected, and invited the Senator from Utah to offer an amendment that would do it. So that is eliminated, so far as the consideration of the bill by the Senator from Montana is concerned.

I apprehend that there is no danger that a State in this Union will permit the funds to be withdrawn by this board because they are not worth, for investment in the enterprises of that State, 2½ per cent. If there is any State where money is so plentiful and the industries so dead and the enterprises that are seeking money so scarce, then I think it is altogether proper the board should have the power to withdraw the money and invest it where it is needed more.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then that opens up the question of their discretionary power. Take it in the South, for instance, when the cotton crop is being moved, or in the West when wheat and corn is being moved, and they require large sums of money. Is it possible that the board is to have the discretion to transfer these funds from section to section, as occasion may require?

Mr. BRISTOW. This board has no discretion to transfer funds at all. When the funds are deposited in the banks they are there and can not be transferred. They remain there in that community.

Mr. SMOOT. Under this bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. Under this bill, if amended as you suggest. If the Senator from Utah will get into his head that the amendment he wants everybody is for, and take it for granted that it is now in the bill, it will eliminate a good deal of this discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know——

Mr. BRISTOW. The board has no authority to transfer any of these funds unless the banks of the State refuse to accept them at 2½ per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or unless the banks of the various States fail to meet the requirements.

Mr. BRISTOW. Unless they could give the security the board desires or the law fixes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have discretionary power in that regard. I presume that it is a wise discretion, although it might be subject to political influence.

Mr. BRISTOW. The bill plainly provides that they shall give indemnity bonds or collateral security for the return of the funds when the depositors demand it, and of course the Senator from Michigan would not want that eliminated from the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I would not.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, some of the observations of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] go to the question of public policy, and I think it is well to very briefly consider that feature. It is not the intention to interject into the affairs of this country any experimental legislation.

As I took occasion to say yesterday, this postal bank system, conceived in the interest of and operated for the benefit of the poor people, has been tried out under all conditions of political organization and geographical extent known to men. It has been in operation in Great Britain since 1861, at the close of over fifty years of agitation on the subject to take it up. In 1888 Mr. Gladstone, who advocated the bill, made this statement in the House of Commons:

> The post-office savings bank is the most important institution which has been created in the last fifty years for the welfare of the people and the State. I consider the act of 1861, which called the institution into existence, as the most useful and fruitful of my long career.

There are 11,000,000 depositors in the savings banks of the United Kingdom. They have in the neighborhood of $700,000,000 on deposit, an average of about $72 per capita. There are a large number of depositors in Japan, with an average deposit to the credit of each of a little over $5.

The provisions of the bill here under consideration do not contemplate any departure into the domain of banking. The bill does not contemplate extending facilities to any person of large means to engage in financial operations. It proposes to extend to the people of this country a class of accommodations extended by the enlightened governments all over the world to their citizens and subjects, to enable the poor people, the children, the stokers, the laboring classes, to save up small pittances with the guarantee of the Government for their repayment.

Now, as to the question of the duty of the Government in this behalf, one of the most deplorable things that can happen anywhere and one of the most pathetic sights to be witnessed on this earth is the failure of a savings bank and the collection of weeping women and disheartened men and children surrounding its closed doors. There is the breeding ground of anarchy, because these poor people can not understand the legerdemain through which their hard-earned wages and savings are taken from them, and that, too, by a process they can not understand. It is the duty of the Government, as it is the interest of the Government, to give to struggling men absolute safety for their small pittance of daily savings up to such point as will enable them to accumulate a sufficient amount to buy an humble home or to invest in something of a stable and reliable character.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to suggest to my honored friend, the Senator from Montana, that that sounds very much like some of the arguments made in behalf of the Oklahoma bank-guaranty plan.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice my distinguished friend, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], sitting near the Senator from Montana; and I think that the arguments that both have made along this line harmonize without very much difficulty.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that since the guaranty plan was adopted in Oklahoma the state bank deposits have increased from $18,000,000 to over $50,000,000.

I will suggest further to the Senator from Michigan, that if he be no more accurate in his discriminating allusions to the Oklahoma bank-guaranty fund than he is to his criticisms on this bill, his observations are not of really great value, because in this very bill he points out that there is no limitation put upon the interest to be charged, and he points out further objections which the bill on its face shows to be unfounded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I did not say that, Mr. President. I did not say there were no limitations as to interest. I knew that the bill fixed the rate of interest.

Mr. OWEN. The notes, I think, will show that the Senator did not express clearly what he intended to say.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think they will show that the Senator has not understood me.

Mr. OWEN. That may be entirely possible, and if that observation was not made by the Senator from Michigan it is not material anyway.

But I want to say on behalf of this measure that it not only will be beneficial to the poor people of the country in having some place where they can place their savings with absolute security, but it is far more important to the United States that this system should be established under the safeguards of this bill, for the reason that it will, above all other considerations, give stability to the commerce of the country, because the very evil which leads to panic in this country, the timidity of the weaker and the poorer depositors, who always make a rush upon the banks in times of financial stress, will be eliminated; and instead of being a source of weakness to the stability of our national commerce, the bill will provide that these persons, even at such times, in withdrawing perhaps deposits from the banks immediately to place them in the hands of the Government of the United States, would, in fact, have those very funds withdrawn placed back in the banks of the immediate vicinity.

Not only is that a sound reason, but the further reason pointed out that to the large number of depositors in stimulating their providence it also stimulates their patriotism, and it will make them all the more earnest and zealous in supporting the Government because of the confidence inspired by their deposits in the hands of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have the highest respect for my friend the Senator from Oklahoma, and I would not intentionally raise a question that might excite his ire.

Mr. OWEN. That is impossible, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I have been very badly misinformed if the bank-guaranty law in Oklahoma has operated to strengthen the confidence of the people of Oklahoma in the government of the State.

Perhaps I am in error about it, but I have noticed only recently a bank failure which involved thousands of depositors and a large sum of money, where the officials of the State of Oklahoma were very sharply criticised for it and judicial proceedings threatened to ascertain whether there had been neglect in state supervision over the failed bank. If I am in error about it, if the system does kindle the patriotism of the people of Oklahoma and really gives them greater security, and if it will operate advantageously to the American people, perhaps that ought to be one very good reason for adopting it.

Mr. OWEN. It is an excellent reason, Mr. President; and the fact that the people of Oklahoma have increased their deposits over 100 per cent under this system, that the deposits have gone from $18,000,000 to over $50,000,000, is the best evidence of their belief in the wisdom and stability of the plan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think all values in Oklahoma have increased proportionately from general causes during the same period.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, we are under some obligation to the people who are emigrating from Michigan to Oklahoma, realizing how much better Oklahoma is than some other parts of the Union.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 2, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 1, 1910.

SURVEYOR-GENERAL.

Edward H. Archer, of Madison, Cal., to be surveyor-general of California, vice William S. Graham, term expired.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Charles D. Ford, of Colorado, to be register of the land office at Denver, Colo., his term having expired. (Reappointment.)

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

INFANTRY ARM.

Capt. Stephen M. Hackney, Sixth Infantry, to be major from January 31, 1910, vice Maj. Richard R. Steedman, Sixth Infantry, retired from active service on that date.

First Lieut. James M. Kimbrough, jr., Twenty-seventh Infantry, to be captain from January 31, 1910, vice Capt. Stephen M. Hackney, Sixth Infantry, promoted.

Second Lieut. Roland W. Boughton, First Infantry, to be first lieutenant from January 31, 1910, vice First Lieut. James M. Kimbrough, jr., Twenty-seventh Infantry, promoted.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 1, 1910.

CENSUS SUPERVISORS.

Harry Burns to be supervisor of the census in the sixth district of Georgia.

William J. Schmidt to be supervisor of the census in the fifth district of Wisconsin.

Lester B. Dresser to be supervisor of the census in the tenth district of Wisconsin.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Francis S. Howell to be United States attorney for the district of Nebraska.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 1, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911; Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and field and station expenses necessary for the use, maintenance, and protection of the national forests.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of securing some information from the chairman of the committee. I notice that the chairman calls attention to the fact that the appropriation is increased by the sum of $397,500 by reason of the addition of approximately 26,000,000 acres to the area of the forest reserve. I find on reference to the report of the Forester that of the approximately 26,000,000 acres added to the area of the reserves about 14,000,000 acres was added in Alaska. Therefore of the increase of $397,500 that is asked for I assume that a proportion of that increase is made necessary by these Alaskan additions. I now find on computing the proportion that the Alaskan additions bear to the total additions that there has been added to the bill $220,110 on account of additions in Alaska, and yet when I turn to the bill and the item now under consideration, for salaries and field and station expenses necessary for the use, maintenance, and protection of the national forests, the two national forest reserves in Alaska, the Tongass and Chogach, are only given the sum of $18,500. In other words, while the committee increases the appropriation by reason of the additions to the reserves in Alaska $220,000 and over, the committee only provides for expenditure in Alaska $18,500. I am anxious, Mr. Chairman, if I can, to reduce the appropriation by the amount it has been increased on account of increased reserves in Alaska, less the sums which are to be used in Alaska. Unfortunately, the new arrangement of dividing up appropriations by reserves presents a condition of affairs where it is almost impossible to find that $220,000. It is somewhere in this bill, because it is an additional appropriation made on account of Alaskan additions. The problem is to find it.

It is not proposed, however, to use any considerable portion of it in Alaska. Then where is it? Whereabouts in the bill is it concealed? There were 12,000,000 additions to the forest, but as they were divided among the various reserves, it is impossible to say whether the additional appropriation which the committee give on account of these reserves, about $175,000, is used for this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming, I wish to say that, as he himself has suggested, it is impossible to locate every dollar of the addition which is authorized in the bill to the current appropriation for the use of the forests. In a general way, however, I may say this: The amount of the appropriation in the current law for taking care of the forests is equivalent to 2.7 cents per acre, whereas the amount carried in the pending bill for this purpose is only 2.5 cents per acre. If the same rate were maintained in this bill which prevails in the present law, the amount of increase would be $715,000 instead of $397,500. The committee feels, therefore, that it has not been extravagant in authorizing this increase.

I think gentlemen do not take into account—because they have not looked the matter up and do not know—the enormous addition to the work of the bureau made necessary by the very great increases in the uses of the forests. It would perhaps surprise gentlemen to learn that each ranger in the forests as now organized has under his jurisdiction 103,000 acres, whereas under the old system, away back in 1901, while the forests were still under the care of the Interior Department, and practically no use was being made of them, each ranger had under his jurisdiction only 98,000 acres. To give the House some information as to the extent to which the work of the bureau has been multiplied by the increasing demand for the various utilities of the forests, I read an extract from the statement of Mr. Pinchot before the Committee on Agriculture in the hearings on page 201:

In 1901 there were 2,300 permits for grazing. Last year there were 27,000. In 1901 there were no special-use permits. Last year there were 5,000. In 1901 there were no permits for crossing forests with stock. Last year there were 2,000. In 1901 there were no permits for private land grazing. Last year there were 1,200. In 1901 there were 283 free-use permits. Last year there were 33,000. In 1901 there was a total of 2,600 permits. This last year there were 69,000. Of timber sales in 1901 there were 31. This year there were 5,000.

Gentlemen will realize——

Mr. TAWNEY. How does the area of the forest compare now as with the year the gentleman is making comparisons?

Mr. SCOTT. The area of course has enormously increased; but I have just stated that in 1901, with the small area of the forests and with practically no use being made of them, there were more rangers in proportion than there are now.

Mr. TAWNEY. The timber sales of course would necessarily increase?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the proportion any greater now than in 1901?

Mr. SCOTT. I have not figured it out. And it does not make any difference so far as my argument is concerned. I am trying to account for the necessity for the large increase in these appropriations, and it seems to me abundantly accounted for when I cite the enormous growth in the work that devolves upon the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. What was the appropriation for the Forest Service of 1901, and what is it now?

Mr. SCOTT. In 1901 the appropriation was $80,000; in 1910 the appropriation is $4,966,319.

Mr. MONDELL. That is some slight increase.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly. It is an enormous increase, but not disproportionate to the area of the forests and the use that is made of them.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell us how much are the receipts now of the Forest Service?

Mr. SCOTT. The receipts from all the uses of the forest in 1909 was $1,870,000.

Mr. MANN. That may be properly deducted from the expense?

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. In making a comparison.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. And still leaves three millions and a half, as compared with $80,000.

Mr. MANN. Well, yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if no amendment is pending, I will ask that the reading shall proceed.

Mr. MANN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question: You have carried in the bill $4,708,000 for the Forest Service; about $750,000 of that is for work outside of the forest reservations?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. These forest reserves are largely what would be called virgin timber, are they not, so far as they are timber at all?

Mr. SCOTT. That is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. If they will ever be profitable to handle as forests, ought they not to be profitable now?

Mr. SCOTT. The reason they are not profitable now is that there is available for lumber uses at the present time a very large amount of land in private ownership, that is better situated, in which the timber can be reached and cut and transported at less expense than it can in the national forests. The gentleman will realize that the more accessible timber was, of course, first sought by private enterprise, and by the time the national-forest policy was adopted there remained but little forest upon the national domain that was readily accessible. For the most part it is in the high and more remote areas of the mountains, and the sale of timber on many of the national forests will not be a profitable business, I take it, until the more accessible private holdings have been disposed of to a considerable extent.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman is fairly accurate in that statement, and yet the great forests which were available a few years ago, easily accessible, have been largely destroyed. There is not much in the way of great forests any more like those that were in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. The forests in California, Oregon, and Washington are not under the control of the forest reserves, in the main. There is this Rocky Mountain territory, where there is more or less forest, largely under the control of the Forest Service. Now, if there ever will come a time when the forest reserves can be made profitable, I do not understand why they can not be made profitable now. They start in with timber certainly as mature as it will ever be, in the main, because it is old enough to have attained its development.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the timber that is cut in the national forests is cut at a profit to the Government. The gentleman must not lose sight of the fact that there is an enormous amount of work done upon the national forests which is not directly concerned with the sale of timber. By far the larger part of this appropriation is expended in the protection of the forests, in guarding them against fire, in looking after the various uses of the forest not directly connected with the manufacture of lumber. The only expense that can be properly charged against the sale of timber, I take it, is the expense of the men directly connected with that sale, whose salaries must be paid on account of the sales, and those proceedings, as I understand it, are profitable. We simply have not yet been able to develop the forests to a degree which makes it possible for us to sell enough timber to make them self-supporting.

(The time of Mr. MANN having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.)

Mr. MANN. I do not lose sight of the fact that the greater portion of the expense is not in connection with the cutting of the timber, but I have heard time out of mind from the Forest Service since I have been in this House, and especially from the very distinguished gentleman who was the Forester, that the Government or other people could profitably maintain forests. That would include not only the cutting of the timber but the preservation of the forest. Now, if the Government can take possession of a virgin forest, where timber is as large and mature as it will ever get, timber that is fairly convenient to transportation—because even in the Rocky Mountains they have the largest of the sawmills—why can not the Government make these forest reserves profitable? They say that other people can make forest reserves profitable. They say that the Government can maintain a forest reservation and make it profitable. Why do they not make it profitable?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the answer which I made to the gentleman's question when he first propounded it ought to be fairly satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. I agree that it is the only answer that can be made, and yet it is not to me satisfactory. I would like to ascertain, if possible, whether the Government, maintaining these forest reservations, does it on the principle of keeping the timber in the future so that it can not be used at all, or whether they do it on the principle that the Government, by maintaining forest reserves, can make forestry profitable.

Mr. LAMB. I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas that his statement corresponds to the report of Mr. Pinchot.

Mr. SCOTT. I was just going to read a brief extract from the hearings before the committee, which I think will throw some light on this question and will confirm what I have just stated. The Forester said:

It is rather curious that in 1901, long before the Forest Service had charge of the national forests, the area to be taken care of by one ranger amounted to about 98,000 acres; and at that time there was practically no work being done on the national forests. Now, with the enormous amount of work being done, one ranger has to take care of 103,000 acres. I would like to illustrate that, if I may. Mind you, each ranger under this bill will have a larger area to take care of than he had in 1901, and also the additional business to which I am about to refer in round numbers. In 1901 there were 2,300 permits for grazing. Last year there were 27,000. In 1901 there were no special-use permits. Last year there were 5,000. In 1901 there were no permits for crossing forests with stock. Last year there were 2,000. In 1901 there were no permits for private land grazing. Last year there were 1,200. In 1901 there were 283 free-use permits. Last year there were 33,000. In 1901 there was a total of 2,600 permits. This last year there were 69,000. Of timber sales in 1901 there were 31. This year there were 5,000.

In other words, not only has the area which a ranger has to take care of increased since 1901, but the work which that ranger has to do has multiplied in some cases hundreds and even thousands of times.

Let me interject a remark that it has been the policy of the Forester always to encourage small sales to men of limited capital rather than to sell the timber to great corporations which own large bodies of their own. Indeed, the service has always refused to make timber sales to great corporations when it knew that they were the prospective purchasers, because it did not want to encourage the corporations to hold their own timber until the supplies on the national forests should be exhausted and they could then force a monopoly price on their own products. I believe that has been a wise policy.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The chairman does not intend to be understood as saying that the Forestry Bureau has not sold timber to great corporations?

Mr. SCOTT. I have the word of the late chief for the statement that it has never knowingly done so.

Mr. MONDELL. In my State the only people it has sold any amount of timber to are the large lumber corporations in the State. Of course, they are not vast corporations, because it is not a great timber country; but their sales have all of them of any moment been to people operating on a very large scale.

Mr. MANN and Mr. GOULDEN rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in whose time is the gentleman speaking, in his own time or mine?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor. The gentleman from Illinois had taken his seat.

Mr. MANN. But that was only to rest. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not know for what purpose the gentleman from Illinois sat down, and recognized the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the total amount carried in the bill for the maintenance of this service?

Mr. SCOTT. For the entire service?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. As I read it, it is $5,043,000.

Mr. SCOTT. The entire appropriation for Forest Service is $5,043,700.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the income from all sources?

Mr. SCOTT. One million eight hundred thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired, and the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming is withdrawn.

Mr. COX of Indiana. This bill says, on page 25, "official traveling and other necessary expenses." I notice that the Government pays the ordinary expenses of postal employees by giving them an allowance per diem, and I think probably the same rule obtains in the Census Department. I would like to ask the gentleman how the employees of this bureau travel; on passes?

Mr. SCOTT. Not at all.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Their expenses are paid?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; on itemized vouchers.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Rendered each month?

Mr. SCOTT. Rendered each month.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman inform the committee about how much the expenses amount to carried in this item a year? I mean the traveling expenses and living expenses and whatever the expense may be.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will notice that the allowance which he has read applies to all the expenses connected with the maintenance of 50 or 60 forests which follow. I can give him an estimate for the traveling expenses of any one of these foresters.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the gentleman will please do so.

Mr. SCOTT. I find in these detailed estimates the station, field, and traveling expenses are lumped together, and in the Kansas National Forest, which I happen to turn to first, the allowance for these expenses is $705.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has the gentleman investigated with a view of determining whether or not any economy could be obtained by allowing a per diem instead of paying the full expense?

Mr. SCOTT. It has been the judgment of the committee, based on the experience of the department, that better results in the way of economy are obtained by requiring itemized vouchers, which are sworn to and present the actual expense incurred, than by allowing a lump sum for expenses.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The per diem allowance given to the postal employees while traveling in the interest of the Post-Office Department ordinarily is $4 per day. Can the gentleman say whether or not these expenses, upon an average, will reach that amount per day?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it has been several years since I investigated that particular matter, and I should hesitate to speak, because I would not feel that I was sure of being right. I can only say that at the time the committee did investigate that particular matter it reached the conclusion that the practice to which I have alluded brought better results.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am rather inclined to the gentleman's view that it should only include the actual expense. I think it would be economy to the Government if that was practiced all around.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. The gentleman from Illinois wants to know why the various reserves do not pay. That is a very simple proposition. The administration of the forest reserves is so scandalously extravagant that it would be utterly impossible for the reserves to pay under any reasonable or proper system of sales. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Agricultural Committee states in its report that it has added $397,500 to this appropriation by reason of approximately 26,000,000 additional acres of reserves. That is approximately a cent and a half an acre. Of the 26,000,000 acres added to the reserves, approximately 14,000,000 acres are in Alaska. On the basis of a cent and a half an acre there has been added to this bill $220,110 on account of additional reserves in Alaska. When we turn to the appropriation for the reserves in Alaska, however, we find that the two reserves in that territory together have an appropriation of only $18,500, so that there is over $200,000 added to this bill for Alaska that is not used in Alaska, and still the committee has added it to the appropriation on the theory that it was necessary for the care of the Alaskan reserves.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman from Wyoming state whether or not the two Alaskan reserves referred to specifically in this bill include the Alexander Archipelago reserve? I can not find it anywhere.

Mr. MONDELL. The two reserves I find are the Tongas and the Chogach.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Alexander Archipelago reserve is the one which includes all of the islands of southeastern Alaska, including Prince of Wales Island, which is 175 miles long and about 75 miles wide. I wanted to know whether that was included in this or not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to my inquiry why this addition was made, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], called our attention to the fact that they were doing more on the reserves now than formerly, that there was greater activity upon the reserves, that there was a greater number of permits and more work on the reserves. Well, if these additional appropriations were to be made on the ground of additional activity, on the ground of necessity for additional clerical force, on the ground of necessity for additional rangers, it seems to me that the Forest Service should have been frank with the House and have said so; but the Forestry Bureau, following its usual line of lacking somewhat in candor with regard to its appropriations, has asked for over $200,000 on account of additional reserves in Alaska, and yet it is only proposing to use $18,500 in Alaska.

In other words, it is simply a pretense, a pretext for adding to the appropriation, and as Alaska contains 378,000,000 acres they can add to the area of the reserves in Alaska year after year until they cover the entire territory and get this appropriation up to $10,000,000, all on account of Alaska, and yet use but a trifling sum there.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to correct his figures? The bill carries a provision for two forests in Alaska, and the aggregate appropriation for it is $26,148 instead of the $18,000 the gentleman states. It is a very small matter, and I realize that it does not impair the force of the gentleman's argument, if his argument is otherwise sound. I wish to make this suggestion: The gentleman has stated that the reason the Forest Service can not be conducted profitably is because it is carried on with such wild extravagance; I believe he used the term "scandalous extravagance"——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope before he closes he will try to inform the committee in what particular this extravagance lies. The Committee on Agriculture certainly wants to know it, if it exists, and the House wants to know, and the gentleman ought not to make a statement of that sort, and, I presume, has not made it, without abundant basis upon which to make it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret that in the space of five minutes it is utterly impossible for me to even begin to express my views as to the scandalous, scandalous extravagance of the Forest Service.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that I desire ten minutes. Forestry and forest reserves have been a fad with the American people for a few years past and it does not seem to matter to them how much it costs. I realize that, and I have exposed myself to all sorts of criticism by being one of the very few people who have had something to say about the extravagance of the service. I have gone into it quite fully in other sessions of Congress. I realize it did not do a particle of good; I realize it did not do any more good than it does now for me to remind the House there is about $220,000 added to the appropriation carried in this bill on the statement of the Forest Service that it is needed for the control and care and maintenance of the additional 14,000,000 acres of reserves in Alaska, while as a matter of fact a comparatively small sum is used in Alaska. As to the 12,000,000 acres of the added reserve it is utterly impossible for us to determine whether the additional sum which the committee gives is to be used within those areas, because it is divided up among many reserves, but in Alaska we have a concrete case.

Approximately 14,000,000 acres are added to the reserves in Alaska, and that makes, on the basis of 1½ cents an acre, the sum of $220,110 added in this bill because of the necessity of policing, patrolling, and caring for these reserves in Alaska. But when the committee comes to appropriate for Alaska—and I am not making a criticism of the committee, I have the highest regard both for the committee and its most able, diplomatic, and good-natured chairman—I realize they are dealing with a thing that is a national fad; I realize how futile my arguments or statements are in the face of the insistence of the American people that this fad shall run to the limit. But a few thousand dollars are found necessary and the additional appropriation is divided up among the reserves generally, gone to swell the clerical forces here in Washington, gone to swell the forces in the six district headquarters, gone to swell the mileage account of men who are sent wherever there is a great meeting in the West which might pass resolutions critical of the Forest Service, to hold meetings of rangers and supervisors at the same time, as was done a few days ago in Ogden and a short time ago in Denver. Certainly members of the committee have not forgotten the $200,000, I believe it was, that was proposed to be paid for the education of young men of the Forest Service in the agricultural colleges of Western States, and a curious thing about that arrangement was that just after these young gentlemen entered one of these agricultural colleges the faculty of the college and some others resolved themselves——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Members of the faculty of that agricultural college and some others met as a state forestry association and passed resolutions highly commendatory of the Forest Service. And why not? The service had added to their student body a considerable number of fine young men whose tuitions were paid by the Government as well as full pay. Now, I could go on at great length and point out what I consider extravagance of the Forest Service, but I do not care to take the time of the committee in doing so, for I realize that the committee proposes to give the Forest Service whatever it asks and without much question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the House is so infatuated in what the gentleman calls a "fad" in reference to the Forest Service that it is disposed to condone the scandalous use of money by the Forest Service? If the gentleman can give the information to the House, does not the gentleman believe that the House is just as anxious to have information of the administration of the Forest Service and information as to the handling of the government money as are those who may be opposed to the Forest Service?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, of course, that is somewhat a matter of opinion. If I were in favor of the Appalachian and White Mountain forest reserves, perhaps I should not criticise any use of this appropriation to carry on that propaganda, and thereby get great support in the South and East. If I believed in the national control of the range in the West, as the great cattlemen of the West do, I might be disposed to look with favor and approval on considerable portions of the hard cash of the forest appropriation being used to carry on that propaganda.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Do I understand that you think the Forest Service discriminates against the small cattle owner?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that is a large question, Mr. Chairman. If I had time I could give a few concrete cases of that kind; yes.

Mr. COCKS of New York. The remarks of the gentleman would certainly indicate that the big cattlemen were favored by this proposition, but from all that I have heard from the West the complaint was that the service discriminated, if anything, in favor of the small cattle owner.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that $85,000 of expenditure per annum for the publication of praise of the methods of the Forest Service is a very powerful influence in bringing people to that view.

Mr. COCKS of New York. The gentleman would not consider as an answer to my question what they do through their press bureau, but it looks to me he ought to know some cases where they have discriminated against the small cattle owner, and if he does, I shall be pleased to hear of it.

Mr. MONDELL. The Forest Service, in so far as I know of its operations, has the support of almost every great interest in the country in which it operates. Now, it is all nonsense to talk about the big men being against the Forest Service. The great timber owners of the country have been hand in glove with the service and are; and to a certain extent I do not blame the service for that, because the very fact of the retention of vast areas of timber lands in the hands of the Government must inevitably enhance the present value of all individual holdings. It has had that effect to a very marked degree.

I called the attention of the House a year or two ago to one case where the stumpage price of lumber in a certain district in my State was raised $6 in one year by reason of the establishment of a forest reserve. The large lumbermen in my State have never complained to me about the Forest Service, except that one of them complained because I, on the floor of the House, did call attention to the fact that he was compelled to pay $6 stumpage. I do not appear on this floor for the big lumbermen or the little lumbermen, but I appear here—or endeavor to—for the people as a whole and for a fair deal for everyone.

Now, this man had a monopoly in that region. He was not complaining because he paid $6 for stumpage when private stumpage in the community was worth $1.50, because he had established a monopoly. I was complaining on behalf of my constituents, who paid the $6 per thousand additional price for lumber. Now the gentleman asks about——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. COCKS of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more. I want to get a concrete example where the Forest Service has discriminated against the small cattle owner in his or any other State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. The attitude of the great cattle associations of the country is well known. There are many men in this House who understand who constitute the National Live Stock Association. Some very good friends of mine are in that association. They are all rich and powerful men. That association is composed largely of the great cattle barons of the United States. There are also in that association some small men. That association has invariably, at all times and under all circumstances, stood up for the Forest Service. That indicates, I think, the position of the large cattle owners. Now, I will say to the gentleman very frankly that I could tell him instances in my own State where small men have been discriminated against, but I do not care to publish on the floor of the House the names of such men. I have in mind one case where one great cattle company, the owner of which is a good friend of mine, a fine man, a gentleman, controls about 55 miles in length and 20 miles in depth in the forest reserves, against all comers, great and small.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Well, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question? Were any small men rejected or their offers refused on account of these men?

Mr. MONDELL. Time out of mind, Mr. Chairman. I know that the gentleman is assuming that everything is as it should be in the Forest Service, and can not realize that some things are not as they ought to be.

As the gentleman knows, I have always been in favor of the national forestry policy.

Mr. SCOTT. But "agin" its enforcement. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I am against its enforcement in the way in which it is now enforced, because the national forestry policy has long since ceased to be a forestry policy. The National Forest Bureau has become a bureau preaching every fad wafted to it by any wind that blew. The bureau has spent its time and the public money preaching the establishment of Appalachian and White Mountain forest reserves. It has spent its time and public money in our western country preaching the establishment of federal control of the range. It has spent more money in matters that do not directly relate to the preservation of the forests in the reserves than in matters that do relate to that subject. The Interior Department for $350,000 protected the forests as well as they are protected to-day, with less fire loss. The acreage was then one-third what it is now. At the same ratio the Interior Department for $1,000,000 would have given protection to the present area, as against $4,000,000 expended by the Forest Service. No man can say the fire protection not as good then as it is now.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Forest Service is so important in the country in which I live, it is so necessary a service, that we have been for years hoping that it would become a real Forest Service, for the care and protection of the forests, and that it would not keep piling up bills of expense in traveling expenses, in its press bureaus, in its high salaries for some men whose usefulness is questionable, but would come back to the reasonable care of those great assets of the Nation in the West.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. After these forest reserves have been established and leased to cattlemen, is it not a fact that those cattlemen and the cowboys whom they employ do everything in their power to protect the grass, because if the grass is burned up they will lose their stock? Is not that true?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think I have said anything to the contrary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think that is one of the strongest reasons not only why we should maintain the Forest Service, but why we should lease the entire public domain of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is in favor of the leasing of the range.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman if he has ever come before the Agricultural Committee and called attention to any specific case where the little man has been discriminated against? I want to assure him that the whole committee would have been very happy to take up a case of that kind and see that it did not occur again.

Mr. MONDELL. I called attention, last year or the year before, to one case where a small sheep man with one band of sheep was compelled to leave the range allotted to a great cattle company, compelled to go 120 miles to a summer range, when they had been occupying a range 20 miles away, and compelled to cross a state line, where they met a state quarantine, and to cross a range of mountains, in order to get to feed. There are many cases of complaint.

Mr. COCKS of New York. But the gentleman never appeared before the Agricultural Committee. This was in his general set speech that he has made annually for several years and, I suppose, did not receive the attention that it would if it had been made before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not made any set speeches. I have made a few remarks when the Committee of the Whole were discussing the bill, and I again call the attention of the committee to the important fact that the sum of over $220,000 was added to this bill, distributed through the bill, and therefore possibly not reachable, but added to the appropriation on the statement that it was needed for the care and preservation of reserves in Alaska, reserves, by the way, much of which is as innocent of tree growth as the floor of this Chamber.

Mr. MANN. There are a great many green things here. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. They must come from along the lake shore.

Mr. COCKS of New York. When the Forester was before the committee he testified that in 1901 there were 2,300 permits for grazing, while last year there were 27,000 permits for grazing. That means that the number of individuals pasturing stock must have increased. Of course the acreage of reserves has very greatly increased.

(The time of Mr. MONDELL having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended two minutes.)

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there are many reasons for the increase of the number of permits. It is partly due to the very laudable—from the standpoint of the Forest Service—plan whereby a large sheep man is requested to divide his permits up. It does not look well to give a man a permit for 15,000 or 20,000 sheep, and so Mr. Jones, the owner of the sheep, gets a permit, and Mr. Jones's herders each get permits, and in that way you increase the number of permittees without interfering at all with the benefits received by the owner on the reservations. The plan works quite as well with cattle.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman from Wyoming think it would be imposing on him if I should ask him to file statements with the Committee on Agriculture in accordance with his statement just made for use in making the appropriations next year?

Mr. MONDELL. I think I can do that, and I would be glad to.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ANTHONY). Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. SCOTT. I will.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the matter inserted in the hearings on page 216, as to the proposition whether the expense of these forest reserves are not largely augmented by having large areas included in them which ought not to be; that is, not forest lands, not grazing lands, and absolutely no use for the conservation of water?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, an answer to that question would be the determination of the fact. The gentleman states that large areas of land are included in the forest reserves which ought not to be so included. The Forester, in response to questions which are always put to him when he comes before the committee, has declared with all possible emphasis that there are no such lands; that during the past summer an additional survey was made of all the forests with the purpose directly in view of excluding any lands which ought not to be made a part of the forest reserves.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the chairman look at the schedule 77, on page 216 of the hearings. I call attention to these figures, which he probably has not examined carefully. In the Manti National Forest, Utah, there are 786,000 acres, and the standing timber amounts to 176,000,000 feet. If you divide these two numbers you will find there are 225 feet of lumber per acre. Now, a cord of wood and a thousand feet of lumber is very near the same, so that in that national forest you will find that they have a cord of wood on about 4½ acres.

Mr. MANN. A cord of wood is equal to about half a thousand feet.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Then there would be a cord of wood on about 9 acres. Now, this is valued at $410,000, which would make $1.32 a thousand. Dividing up again, you will find that the timber, according to their own figures, on that national forest is actually worth 52 cents an acre.

Mr. SCOTT. The statement the gentleman from California makes does not convey any information to the Committee on Agriculture, and I fancy it is not new to a large number of Members of the House. It is a well-known fact that all the land included in the national forests is not covered with timber. On the contrary, I believe the statement of the Forester is that only about one-third of it is so covered. The policy of the National Forest Service is not only to preserve the forests that exist, but it is to conserve land which is more valuable for forestry purposes than for any other purpose, and for the purpose of protecting the watersheds of important streams.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Would the gentleman consider land valuable for forest purposes that contained timber only worth 52 cents an acre?

Mr. SCOTT. The fact that it has no valuable timber on it at this time does not prove that it is not valuable for forest purposes. It may be of such a character that it will reseed or can be planted to forests, and therefore become more useful for forests than for any other purpose. It would depend altogether upon whether it was valuable for any other use. Does the gentleman happen to know?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. In the same hearing it says that the stock grazed—cattle and horses, 19,666 head; sheep and goats, 189,000 head—showing that it is purely for grazing purposes. Can the chairman give us any information as to what was paid for the grazing privileges on that reservation?

Mr. SCOTT. I have not the information at hand for that particular forest.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. The estimate in this bill for the care of that reservation is $38,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I will not object now, but the committee must realize that all this proceeding is out of order, and I trust gentlemen will not protract it unnecessarily.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. It goes right to the question of these appropriations.

Mr. SCOTT. I know it does, but it is not addressed to any particular amendment. If the gentleman has a specific amendment to offer I would be glad to give him reasonable time to debate it.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I do not want to pick out any particular forest reserve. If you will examine in the same line of figures, on page 217——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question along that line?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from California has the floor.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. If you will look on another forest reserve, on page 217, you will find the timber in that reserve is valued at 33 cents an acre, and if you will look into the grazing privilege of that reserve you will find that they grazed one cow on 320 acres.

Mr. SCOTT. That would seem to indicate that it is not very much of a grazing proposition.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman from Kansas please answer a question now?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir; if I can.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to state that the Forester stated before the Committee on Agriculture that the forest reserves of the West were practically all forest land or land needed for forest purposes?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman misunderstood me. I stated that the Forester said, according to my best recollection, that about one-third of the reserves were in timber.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Did the committee of which the gentleman has the honor to be chairman consider the memorial of the Colorado legislature to this body in which that legislature this last spring memorialized Congress that out of something like 16,000,000 acres within the forest reserves in the State of Colorado more than two-thirds of the entire forest area was not covered by any merchantable timber whatever, and does the Forester deny that statement of the Colorado legislature?

Mr. SCOTT. That particular statement was not brought to the attention of the Forester. He was questioned very carefully as to the extent to which lands might be of the kind that ought to be excluded.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does the Agricultural Committee consider that it is a good governmental policy to retain within forest reserves, say, 5,000,000 acres in one State of grazing land and lease it to large cattle companies at 2 cents an acre when that land will produce crops worth from $25 to $50 an acre every year if it is cultivated?

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Agriculture does not consider it to be its province to discuss the question of policy to which the gentleman refers. The only function of this committee in relation to the Forest Service, unless some bill is presented asking for new legislation, is to provide the funds to carry forward the work authorized under existing legislation. The chairman, therefore, does not feel called upon to answer specifically the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The question is whether or not it is a good idea to spend all this money conserving sage brush, cactus, and buffalo grass.

Mr. SCOTT. In direct response to that I will read a short statement by Mr. Pinchot before the committee, and I think perhaps the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] might listen with profit to this statement. He was asked upon what theory he was holding land that was not timbered, and he said:

> We are holding it on this theory, and we have held it so from the first—that this land is more valuable for the growth of timber than for any other purpose. There is naturally forested land of the same character in the same neighborhood, and this land which is now timberless will, with help and protection, be restocked with trees.
> I would like to add, Mr. Chairman, if I may, that one of the most important things to understand about the national forests is just this question that you are bringing up. There have been one or two attempts made to eliminate all land from the national forests not now occupied by trees, on the ground that if it is not forest land now it never had been and never would be forest land. That would be precisely equivalent to saying of every city that every building lot which did not have a house on it now should never be built on and should not be subject to taxation or the other laws of the city, or to saying to a farmer that all the land on his farm that did not carry a crop this year should never be allowed to carry a crop.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does not the gentleman know, and does not the Committee on Agriculture know, that land that is at an altitude of 7,000 to 9,000 feet takes from two hundred to four hundred years to grow a saw log, and at a little higher altitude five hundred years, and do we want to wait five hundred years or from two to five hundred years to grow trees, when in a lower altitude the same size trees can be grown in five to ten years?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, "the eternal years of God are long," and if the land is not fit for anything but growing trees, I guess we can afford to wait four hundred years.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If it is worth $50 an acre, as some of the land adjoining the forest reserves to-day is worth that sum and some of it $200 or $300 an acre, why do we want to keep that within forest reserves? You ask for a concrete case. I will say that I own two small ranches, one of them of 20 acres and the other of about 50 acres, within a mile and a half of a forest reserve. I can sell every acre of that cultivated land for $300 an acre, and it is not any better land than some that is in the forest reserve.

Mr. SCOTT. Is the land within the forest reserves of the same character?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. And does it have the same relation to water?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. Much of it can be cultivated and irrigated.

Mr. SCOTT. So that ranches just as valuable could be made of it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. I think there are approximately 5,000,000 acres of land in Colorado that can be turned into profitable agricultural use if we can get them eliminated from the forest reserve.

Mr. SCOTT. Then the State of Colorado is sleeping upon its rights, either the State or the citizens of Colorado, because under the law they have an absolute right to claim land within the reserve that is more valuable for agriculture than for other purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We have been trying to do it for five years, and let me call the attention of gentlemen on the other side to the fact that one of the numerous reasons that there are three Democrats here to-day instead of the three Republicans that were here a year ago is because of our people's inability to get this administration or the last one to open up these reserves to settlement under the homestead laws.

Mr. SCOTT. The citizens of Colorado have evidently pursued the wrong methods. [Laughter.] They have carried their grievance to the polls instead of to the courts.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They have carried it to the courts and every other possible source, but they have been unable to get relief, and some of them have thought, possibly, if they would protest that way that you gentlemen would consider it——

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the discussion is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MONDELL. I should like to inquire of the chairman how the people of that western country can get to the courts with any of these questions? We have been asking that question for a number of years.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will point out the remedy, I would like to know it.

Mr. SCOTT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. SCOTT. I never knew of a right granted to any citizen under the law that there could not somewhere be found a method by which to enforce that right.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the gentleman is fortunate that he has not lived in the country I have, because I have seen many, many cases where——

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is well taken, and I should be very glad indeed to proceed at once to a reading of the bill, but I do feel that statements have been made to which the House is entitled to a brief reply, and if there is no objection, I should like to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have always refrained, when this bill was before the House, from entering into a protracted discussion either as to the policy of the forest reserves or as to the manner in which that policy is being carried out, because I conceived it to be my duty to get this appropriation bill passed through the House with as little delay and with as few changes as possible. And I do not propose now to enter into a discussion of the broad policy of the service or to endeavor to discuss in detail the manner in which that policy is enforced. I do wish to express my regret, however, that gentlemen who have attacked the service have not been able to lay their fingers on some specific instance of "scandalous" extravagance. The Committee on Agriculture, knowing that this bureau is always subject to attack, if not under suspicion, realizing that the rapid increase of the appropriation must inevitably attract attention, has always exercised unusual diligence in the effort to discover extravagance if it existed and to correct it if it were found. Possibly we have not been the best cross-examiners. The truth remains at least that we have not been able to find any instance in which expenditures could be reduced. I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House to the extent to which the bill this year has been itemized.

There are now carried here in 12 pages of the bill matter which in former times was carried in 12 lines. We have done this in the hope that when the different items are laid out in this way Members will be able to scan them, and if there are extravagances they will be able hereafter to point them out. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] suggested that the former chief of the service had not been entirely candid and frank, perhaps, in statements made to the committee. I wish to say to him that there is no bureau coming before our committee which submits its estimates in fuller detail. I hold in my hand a typewritten book of hundreds of pages in which the appropriations for the coming year are itemized in the minutest detail. I read here, for example, the estimated improvements that are contemplated in the Teton National Forest:

Two miles of trail, at $60; 4 miles of road, at $450; 1 bridge, $655; repairs, roads and rails, $200; repairs, cabins, barns, and telephone, $107.

I turn over to another schedule and find items of "field instruments and equipment," and I will refer to some of them to show upon what these estimates are based. It contains axes, barometers, calipers, chains, compasses, magnifying glasses, hammers, markings, handles, long (for marking hatchets and marking axes), instruments (drafting), pencils—and so on, with almost infinitude of detail, showing that the matter has been worked out somewhere with the greatest care.

Now, as to the matter of extravagance in salaries to which the gentleman referred. The Keep Commission reported that the salaries paid in the Bureau of Forestry were lower, on an average, than in any other bureau of the Department of Agriculture, and the salaries in the Department of Agriculture lower than the average for most of the departmental service.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman tell us who constituted the Keep Commission?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Pinchot was a member of the commission, but I take it that some of the other members had something to say in the report which they were making. Furthermore, I think the gentleman's insinuation is far from warranted by the character of Mr. Pinchot and the other gentlemen who made up that commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, let the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Absaroka National Forest, $20,844;

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I observe on this page, near the bottom of page 37, there are certain appropriations for about 150 national forest reserves, appropriating several million dollars. Now, I think that this bill ought to designate or give the location of each one of these reservations. I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me that it would be of decided benefit to the House if we had the information as to the States in which these reservations are located. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the gentleman in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, before the bill passes, do insert the name of the State or States in which each one of these particular forest reserves is located.

Mr. MANN. And Territories or districts.

Mr. TAWNEY. And Territories.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman may offer his suggestion in the form of an amendment, but I shall object to it as a request.

Mr. TAWNEY. The difficulty in my offering it would be this: I can not do it without unanimous consent, except by proposing an amendment to each one of these paragraphs as read, and then to be able to do it I would have to have the information. I do not know whether they are all located in one State or in what particular State.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Oh, yes; you do.

Mr. TAWNEY. I may know as to many of them, but I think it would be a decided advantage to the House for us to known hereafter as well as now the territory or geographical location of these various forest reserves.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will yield to me for a brief statement, I believe he will revise his opinion upon this question. As originally submitted for the consideration of the committee this list of forests did contain the name of the State or Territory in which they were all located. But before the committee had completed consideration of the bill officials of the Forest Service came and asked to make certain corrections in the language of the estimates, stating that those estimates had been made last July or August, and since that time the boundary of the forests in question had been changed, and they wished therefore to change the name either of the forest itself or the State in which it was originally reported as being located. In some instances they found that mistakes had been made in the first instance, a forest being listed as being in Nevada, for example, when it was afterwards found to be in Nevada and California.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me? Does the gentleman think the errors of the department constitute a reason why it should not be required to mark and definitely designate the geographical situation?

Mr. COCKS of New York. It is sometimes in two States.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience he will perhaps see why we have made this amendment. Now, the fact, Mr. Chairman, that even after three or four months it is found necessary to correct this language in the estimates and the further fact that in case Congress should appropriate for the support and protection of a forest reputed to be located in Nevada, and it should prove to be located in California, would bring the service into conflict with the officials of the Treasury, suggested to the committee the thought that all reference to the States should be omitted. I believe that no injury can result to the public service, while a great deal of good may follow if the bill is allowed to stand in its present form. What difference does it make whether you print in the law the name of the State in which the forest is located? There are no two forests of the same name. They all have to be designated. The law provides that the President may change the boundaries or change the name of a forest whenever the public service seems to demand it, and yet, if this amendment were adopted, he might be deterred from doing so. All these considerations led me to the conclusion, and led the committee to the conclusion, that it would be in the interest of the public service, and of no possible detriment to any branch of it, simply to omit the names of the States from the appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What State is the Siuslaw National Forest located in?

Mr. SCOTT. I can tell the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I thought perhaps the gentleman could tell offhand.

Mr. SCOTT. It is in Alaska.

Mr. MANN. No; but the gentleman did not tell offhand. He had to refer to a book to find out.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman would not expect the chairman of the committee to commit this long list of forests to memory.

Mr. MANN. The reason I asked the gentleman was because I expected he would not know. It shows that Members of the House can not know, but that if the State or Territory was in the bill, everybody would know; that is, everybody except the Forest Service.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it not true that anybody interested enough to inquire can find out?

Mr. MANN. I am interested in all these items.

Mr. SCOTT. What difference does it make to the gentleman whether the Siuslaw National Forest is in Alaska or in Wyoming?

Mr. MANN. It may make no difference to the gentleman where money is to be expanded, but in my consideration of an appropriation bill it does sometimes make a difference whether a forest reservation is located in Maine or the north end of Alaska, or in the south end of New Mexico or Arizona. I would like to know as a matter of information. It makes no difference what the name is. If the gentleman's committee puts in an item giving the name and the amount, the name gives no information to me at all. If the State was in it would give me some information. Now, it does seem to me that the people in charge of the forest reservations, however little they may know about some parts of the reservations, ought at least to know what States the reservations are in.

Mr. SCOTT. The idea of the committee in itemizing the appropriation in this respect was this: We realized that the average citizen or the average Member of Congress would not be any better able to determine whether this fund was being economically and honestly expended by the fact that it was appropriated for the specific use of some particular forest and if it were appropriated in a lump sum; but we did figure that Members living in the States where the forests were located would be able in this way to check the matter up in a degree. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], for example, ought to have, and no doubt would have, an excellent judgment as to whether the amount we appropriate here for the care and maintenance of some particular forest in his State is extravagant or otherwise.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Kansas accept the judgment of the gentleman from Wyoming as to whether or not the amount appropriated for the forest reserves in that State is sufficient or insufficient?

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman from Wyoming will submit an amendment proposing a change in any appropriation for the support of any forest in his State, the gentleman from Kansas will not contest it, but will leave it to be settled between the gentleman from Wyoming and his constituents.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not the gentleman think that every Member of this House is entitled to information respecting the geographical location of these forest reserves that we are specifically appropriating for?

Mr. SCOTT. Absolutely. I think they ought to have it if they want it.

Mr. TAWNEY. If that is so, it can be very easily given to the House by the gentleman inserting in this bill the State or Territory or two States in which a reservation is located.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will.

Mr. SCOTT. The committee had no other purpose in the world——

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not criticising the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. The committee had no other purpose in the world in eliminating the names of the States in which these national forests are located than to simplify the bill, to simplify the law, and avoid any possible controversy or confusion in the control of the forests, in the appropriations, and in the expenditure of the appropriations that are made for their support. Now, if the gentleman can give a good reason why the names of the States should be reinserted the committee will not object.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think I can. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism whatever to make of the committee reporting this bill because of the omission of the States and Territories in which these forest reserves are located. I think the committee is to be commended for the way in which they have brought in the appropriation bill this year for the Forest Service by segregating the various items for which a lump sum has heretofore been appropriated. It is not as valuable now as it will be in the future. Hereafter when this bill is under consideration we will be able, by comparison with previous appropriation bills, to determine what increases have been made, where they have been made, and ascertain by inquiring the reason of the increase or reasons for the reduction.

But I have found in my experience in connection with appropriations reported from the Committee on Appropriations that it is not only of benefit and value to the committee to know the geographical location of the national parks, of which we have a great many scattered all over the United States—it is of importance and of value to the House to know where these parks are located, and it is of far more importance to have the geographical location of the forest reserves mentioned in the bill than it is to have the location of the national parks; because, when we come to consider the appropriations for about 150 or more forest reserves that are specifically appropriated for, we naturally want to know where they are located, how many of them there are in the same State, and we want to know how many are included in one or more States or Territories. It does not impose any additional burden on the committee, and it does not cost any additional money, nor does it tend to confusion in the consideration of the appropriations for these forests, but it rather tends to systematize the work in the House in the consideration of the special appropriations for about 150 forest reserves.

Now, the argument that the gentleman made, and the only reason he gave why this should not be done, was the fact that the Forest Service made some mistake in preparing their estimates originally as to the location of these forest reserves. If mistakes of that kind occurred they were the result of carelessness on the part of those who prepared the estimates, for the Forestry Bureau has the data necessary to inform them as to the exact geographical location of every one of these reserves. The fact that they may change the boundaries slightly from time to time does not militate against the proposition at all. There is, therefore, no reason why this should not be done, and I insist that there are strong reasons why it should be done for the information of the House in order to intelligently consider these appropriations when we come to the consideration of this agricultural appropriation bill. And inasmuch as it does not interfere with the form of the bill, it does not require any extra labor and would be of benefit, or at least could be for the convenience of the House, I think the gentleman ought not to object to my request for unanimous consent that he insert the geographical location of the forest reserves specifically appropriated for in this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that the committee considered carefully before bringing in the bill in the form in which it appears. I think the committee disagrees—I am sure the chairman does—with the position taken by the gentleman from Minnesota. But in order to test the sense of the House, I suggest that he offer an amendment inserting the word "Montana" in line 10, page 25, after the word "Forest;" and if that amendment carries I shall not object to his request for unanimous consent to insert the proper state names in all the other paragraphs.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, line 10, after the word "Forest," insert the word "Montana."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and on a division there were 40 ayes and 20 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I now renew my request for unanimous consent, and I ask that the chairman of the committee be authorized to insert the geographical location of the several forest reserves mentioned in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I suppose what the gentleman means is that the Clerk shall insert on the information given to him by the chairman. The chairman can not insert it in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will change the form of my request, that the Clerk be authorized to insert the geographical location, by name, of the various reserves, upon information furnished him by the gentleman in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to insert the geographical location of the forest reserves on information of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection all pro forma amendments will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Alamo National Forest, $33,449.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I dislike very much to in any way start again the controversy of a while ago, but the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a few moments ago stated that the Forest Service was guilty of scandalous extravagance. He did not use the word "scandalous" only once, but he repeated it so that it would be scandalous, scandalous, and repeated it altogether four or five times.

Mr. MONDELL. Only three, I think.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the gentleman does not change his remarks, and the stenographer took it down correctly, he will find there are five times, because I checked it off on him. When we ask him what this extravagance is, he does not give very specific information. Now, to say in the House that a branch of the government service is guilty of scandalous extravagance, is to make a pretty serious charge. If it be true, it is the duty of the House to investigate the matter, and it is our duty to know whether the money we are appropriating is extravagantly and with scandal expended—not mere extravagance, but extravagance that is such that every one knows there is scandal connected with it. The only statement that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made in answer to my query of what this scandalous extravagance was, was to the effect that the department was engaged in magazine and newspaper work, in propaganda work, in favor of the Appalachian forest reserves, and some other propositions in different portions of the country. I read from the law which is now current, relating to the appropriation for the Forest Service:

No part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article, but this shall not prevent the giving out to all persons without discrimination, including newspaper and magazine writers and publishers, of any facts or official information of value to the public.

Now, the only statement which the gentleman offered to make specifically went to the effect, as I understood it, that this service was scandalously extravagant because it was engaging in propaganda work through the newspapers and magazines. If that statement be true, it is in direct violation of the law, and these gentlemen ought to be brought to book before the proper legal authorities. If that statement is not accurate, then the gentleman owes an apology to the House and to the Forest Service. It seems to me that the gentleman ought not in the House, charging the House with the responsibility, state that the money being appropriated by the House is used for purposes in direct conflict with the provision of the law unless the gentleman has the proof, and if he has the proof it ought to be submitted to the House before we make another appropriation which can be used for that purpose, because after the gentleman's statement that this money is being expended in this way in scandalous extravagance, every Member of the House is put upon notice that if those statements are correct he is now asked to vote for appropriations which have been used, which are now being used, and which may be used in the future in direct violation of the law which accompanies the appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the statements which I made in regard to the expenditures of the Forest Service were made with a full realization of their seriousness, and had I the time I should have no difficulty, I think, in proving to Members of the House who do not consider that every expenditure made by the Forest Service for whatever purpose is and must be proper that the service had been scandalously expending the government money. I have in my hand a clipping from the New York Tribune of Friday, January 21, that contains a statement of a matter, known of us all, with regard to the education or the payment of tuition of young men in the government service in certain western agricultural colleges. It is stated in the clipping I have before me that they have been spending $40,000 a month illegally, and that there was a proposed total expenditure of $200,000 this winter in that way, and I understand that the officials of the Treasury Department have refused to pay those bills. The service has been engaged in that sort of work for some time, I am told. I have known of it, but I have not thought it was worth my while to call it to the attention of the House, so thoroughly convinced has the House seemed to be that whatever the Forest Service may do is done in good faith and within the appropriation and for the benefit of the service and of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Forest Service——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that his former statement being a reflection upon the Forest Service, the present statement is rather a reflection upon the House——

Mr. MONDELL. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. That the House will make an appropriation notwithstanding the gentleman should show that it was used with scandalous extravagance.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not make my statement in exactly that way, Mr. Chairman. I did not charge the House with any intent of making appropriations that are going to be used with scandalous extravagance. I tried to call to the attention of the House a year ago the fact that the establishment of the six district headquarters had cost the Government three-quarters of a million dollars, without reducing to any considerable amount the cost of the service here in Washington.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will permit, the chief of the bureau stated to the committee that the additional cost of establishing the six district headquarters was $100,000 a year.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I itemized the statements taken from the reports of the service last year and it amounted to, as I recollect it, in the neighborhood of $750,000, the additional cost of the service by reason of the establishment of those headquarters; of course it may not cost that much additional each year. If it only costs $100,000 additional each year, that I submit is a considerable increase. Now, it may be that the service needs $44,000 worth of typewriters in one year. I called the attention of the House in the consideration of a former bill to the fact of the remarkable estimate for typewriters as one of the items of this wonderfully elaborate system of enumeration on proposed expenditures to which the chairman refers.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say they do not need the $44,000 worth of typewriters?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I suppose I should assume they may need more money for typewriters than they do for fighting fires or caring for the forests, but it seems to me rather out of proportion to spend $44,000 for typewriters and——

Mr. MANN. I am not sure it is as much as we spend here in the House of Representatives for its Members.

Mr. MONDELL. This service spent $87,000 last year for a press bureau.

The amendment to which the gentleman referred is the amendment which I offered, and it was adopted by the House, I think, three years ago, intending to limit the then operations of the bureau. It did limit it to a certain extent, but to a certain extent only, because the service has the most marvelous press bureau in the world to-day, and it sends to every newspaper in the country these documents, lurid, some one suggests, telling of the wonderful work of the service and informing the people of the marvelous things the service has done and proposes to do for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the compensation of the official "puffer?"

Mr. MONDELL. I did not know that there is a person under that title in the service. I know they have wonderful titles there, but I never heard and did not know that they had named him, the official in question, the "puffer;" it is appropriate.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman suggest some of these wonderful titles to which he alludes.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, there was a time I did not understand what a silviculturist or a dendrologist was, but I have discovered now.

Mr. COCKS of New York. That is your fault.

Mr. MONDELL. There are many wonderful titles in the Forest Service, all of which denote, I have no doubt, very excellent service. Another matter, Mr. Chairman; I do not believe it is necessary for the Forest Service to gather its rangers and supervisors in the West in great numbers just at times when other public gatherings are to be held, which might, if not properly influenced, pass resolutions not complimentary to the service. Now, the gentleman may not consider that scandalous. I do; I think it is a scandalous use of public money.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, the House has no information upon the subject in a definite charge, but simply the wild statement of the gentleman upon the subject.

Mr. SCOTT. The statement the gentleman makes is absolutely and explicitly contradicted by the chief of the service.

Mr. MANN. There has been no definite statement made.

Mr. MONDELL. I will make a statement definitely. When the National Woolgrowers' Association met in Ogden a short time ago, the exact date of which I think my friend from Ohio can give me——

Mr. COLE. January 7.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). There was a meeting of the foresters and supervisors of the surrounding country held at Ogden. I know nothing of the meeting except as I heard and read of it through the papers published in that region. If no such meeting was held, then the newspapers are to blame. The newspapers said there were several hundred rangers and supervisors, and referred to the fact that their presence was appreciated; that they were helping out the hotels, and in many ways they were adding to the popularity of the service. I assume they were all there under pay. I venture to say they all drew mileage. If it was any part of their duty to be there in consultation, I should certainly be the last person to criticise their meetings.

Mr. SCOTT. Was it not advisable to have them there for the purpose of consultation when they were in charge of the reservations that the woolgrowers at that association were using?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not believe that these two bodies ever took any official or unofficial action with reference to the range at all. My information, such as I have, and my belief is, that they did not. Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, it is not a pleasant duty for me to criticise the Forest Service. In the first place, I know personally many high-minded, earnest, faithful men in that service, and I believe in them. Further than that, the Forest Service is necessary, for the present at least. In a way it is a necessary evil. But it is a necessity at this time. I never will believe that retaining vast areas within the borders of a State and holding it under permanent federal control is an unmixed blessing. It never can be. But as conditions stand, we must have, at least for a time, federal control of these reserves, and our people desire it; but they hope the Forest Service will keep within proper bounds and that it will care for the forests, and not attempt to control and supervise all of our industries in the reserves.

Mr. Chairman, I am certainly not opposed to appropriations to be expended largely in the region in which I live. I do not claim a greater virtue in this regard than other Members of the House, but there are two reasons why I continue to call attention to the extravagance of this service.

The first, because I believe it my duty to call attention to extravagance in the public service wherever I find it; and, second, because the effect of this extravagant service in our region is this: We realize, and I think the service realizes, that this House will not forever continue to appropriate sums each year two and three times greater than can be obtained from the resources of the forest reserves, and the Forest Service is therefore fastening federal control on every industry in the reserves, levying a tax on everything from the keeping of bees to the turning of a turbine, with a view of eventually securing a vast revenue.

Mr. GOULDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman who is chargeable with the abuse in this service—who is responsible for it?

Mr. MONDELL. The House partly, in my opinion, without intending any criticism of my fellow-Members. The fault lies partly in the fact that we do not scrutinize these appropriations as we should. If we kept the service within proper bounds by reasonable appropriations, it would not be tempted to tax everything in sight, and would not have money to spend for purposes not necessarily incident to the Forest Service.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am glad the gentleman has pleaded guilty, and I hope others on his side will do the same under his lead.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not have influence enough to reduce these items. The House can do it if it will.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. But I can give the gentleman this information: Here is $200,000 for the schooling of forest officers. I do not know how much they have expended for mileage of their men attending meetings. I do not know how much they might reduce the expenditure annually of $90,000 for a press bureau, but from having examined the output of that bureau, I should say they should reduce it three-fourths without loss to the people.

Mr. GOULDEN. Is there anything authorizing that press bureau under the law?

Mr. MONDELL. I doubt it.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I attended the National Woolgrowers' meeting at Ogden on the 7th day of January. I did not know at the time that there was a meeting of the members of the Forest Service there. It may be true. I was in the city of Ogden two days, and have an account of the whole meeting of the association, but I did not observe anything in the papers nor any statement relative to that meeting of which the gentleman from Wyoming makes mention.

But, Mr. Chairman, if there had been a meeting there at the time of this meeting in connection with the Forest Service, it occurs to me that it would have been in harmony with their public duty and in the line of their public duty. There are 6,500,000 sheep on the national domain. These sheep men in the West, so far as I could glean from conversation and newspaper report, are not satisfied with the administration of that service on the reservations. It comes from two reasons: First, on account of the charge that is made for grazing; and it would seem to me, from the investigation the committee has made and the report that the department gives us each year, that the price for grazing is not at all exorbitant, and it is made a considerable source of income to sustain that department.

Then there is another condition there about which they complain, and that is this: The intercourse with the individual members of the Forest Service and the conduct of these men toward them; and it occurs to me that that was the very place for these men to be on that occasion, in close contact with these sheep men of the national association, so that they could come to better terms, get better acquainted, and work upon a more satisfactory basis.

Now, just one word in regard to the extravagance of this bureau. As the chairman already stated, we have no better reports from any bureau in this department than from the Forestry Bureau. The chief of this bureau always appears before the committee and makes an extended report. I have a volume here of the hearings last year, in which I think almost 200 pages are devoted to the Bureau of Forestry, in which they make a detailed account of all the operations of that bureau, all the receipts and all the expenditures. And while the members of our committee are, I think, of average intelligence at least, and of at least average industry in making our inquiries and investigations, we have not discovered this great extravagance that is charged. If any Member of this House can locate it, I consider it to be his duty to appear before the committee and give them the information. Whenever the information is furnished to the committee, I assure you that our report to this House will be in conformity with that information.

Now, as to the making of these various districts, Mr. Pinchot appeared before our committee this year. My recollection is he said from the standpoint of efficiency and good of the service it was the best movement the bureau had made in all its history. So we have the testimony of the Chief Forester on that proposition. How else are we going to get this information? In my judgment, it is the duty of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] or the gentlemen from any of these Western States directly affected, where they find there is an exorbitant appropriation, to report the matter to the committee, so that we can take proper action. Until that time comes, we must act upon the information at our command, and such has been the report brought into this House by the Committee on Agriculture. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DIEKEMA having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5236) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 22.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Gen. Lewis Wallace, presented by the State of Indiana, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Indiana.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure suitable copper-process plates to be bound with these proceedings.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cheyenne National Forest, $28,350.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, line 9, strike out "Cheyenne" and substitute "Medicine Bow."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be directed, in making up the bill, to arrange this list of forests in alphabetical order, in order properly to take care of the amendment which has just been adopted and another which I will offer later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to arrange the names of these forests in alphabetical order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Medicine Bow National Forest, $19,854.

Mr. SCOTT. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 31, line 8, strike out the words "Medicine Bow" and substitute "Colorado."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nebraska National Forest, $18,250.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have listened yesterday and to-day to this discussion about the appropriations for these national forest reserves. In my State of Nebraska you appropriate $18,000 for the maintenance of a national reserve. You can buy all the timber on that reserve for less than $5,000. You can not propagate timber there, because the reserve is leased to sheepmen, and the sheep eat off every bush that grows. I agree with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that these appropriations seem extravagant, unreasonable, and uncalled for. We commenced in 1901 with an appropriation of $90,000. In nine years we have increased it to $5,000,000. Now, what have we got for it? Are we making parks or pleasure reserves out of these forest reserves, or are we trying to propagate and increase the growth of timber? If we are trying to increase the growth of timber, we are also leasing these reserves to men who are grazing sheep, goats, and cattle and horses on them and thereby destroying every small tree and bush. Now, the two things do not work together. It is unwarranted extravagance and misjudgment in my opinion. I am not criticising the members of this committee; but are the people getting value received for the money expended? It looks to me as though they are not.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LATTA. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I believe the gentleman addresses his remarks to the paragraph for the maintenance of the national forest reserve in Nebraska.

Mr. LATTA. Yes; that with the other.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman offer an amendment to reduce it?

Mr. LATTA. No.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman desire to submit an amendment striking out the paragraph from the bill?

Mr. LATTA. Not unless you strike out the others; strike out the entire appropriation. I simply wanted to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am acquainted somewhat with the Nebraska Forest Reserve, and I know it is extravagant to appropriate $18,000 for the maintenance of that forest reserve.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman knows that, I hold it to be his duty to offer an amendment proposing a reduction of the appropriation. That is why we have itemized these appropriations in this bill——

Mr. LATTA. I will move to strike the appropriation out entirely.

Mr. SCOTT (continuing). So that gentlemen having personal knowledge of the conditions existing in these reservations can submit amendments, if the appropriations are considered too large, that will correct it; and I insist that the gentleman either ought to submit an amendment proposing a reduction or else withdraw the statement that there is unreasonable extravagance.

Mr. CARLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question.

Mr. SCOTT. The time belongs to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CARLIN. Assuming that the gentleman's statement is correct, and we have no information to the contrary, is the chairman of the committee willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska as correct, and will he accept an amendment if he will offer it?

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman from Nebraska will offer an amendment either striking out the paragraph relating to the Nebraska National Forest Reserve or to reduce it, while I have no authority to accept it, I will vote for it and put it up before the House.

Mr. LATTA. I will offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the entire appropriation for the Nebraska Forest Reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, strike out lines 15 and 16.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield for a question?

Mr. LATTA. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Are there any trees on this forest reserve in Nebraska?

Mr. LATTA. On one reserve there is not a tree or a bush; on the other there are a few trees scattered along a stream that runs through it.

Mr. MONDELL. Who uses the reservation?

Mr. LATTA. It is rented to some range men.

Mr. MONDELL. Are they the same men that had it fenced, and were required to take down the fences for fear of prosecution?

Mr. LATTA. I think they are the same parties—the Ricketts-Comstock Company.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the chairman of the Agricultural Committee seems to me hardly fair, that if any Member of the House believes that an appropriation to be expended in his district is excessive he should make a motion to strike out the particular section, leaving the general plan untouched. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of the criticism of this particular appropriation which has just been made by the gentleman from Nebraska, how much the total is that we are spending for these forest reserves each year?

Mr. SCOTT. In round numbers about $4,000,000 for the work of taking care of the forests.

Mr. GAINES. How many acres does that take care of?

Mr. SCOTT. About 200,000,000 acres.

Mr. GAINES. Is there an estimate of the amount of timber on the 200,000,000 acres? The reason I ask is that we have been told by the gentleman from Nebraska that there is a forest reservation there with practically no timber on it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, estimates have been made of the amount of timber in the national forest reserves. It has been some time since I saw those figures, and I would not trust my memory to quote them.

Mr. GAINES. As to the particular forest reserve in which we are told by the gentleman from Nebraska that there is no timber, what is the reason for having a reserve there, especially in connection with the statement that the land is leased out for grazing of cattle and sheep? Of course, if it is leased for grazing any small timber that begins to grow would be destroyed.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, at the very earnest appeal of the Representatives from Nebraska and representatives from Kansas national forest reserves were established in both of those States. The land was reserved from the public domain which did not have a shrub on it, the purpose of the reservation being to determine whether or not it might be possible to reforest land in that region. I speak with some knowledge of the Kansas reservation, and I presume the character of the Nebraska reservation is much the same. For the most part the land is made up of sand hills, west of the one hundredth meridian, in an arid portion of the country. It was thought desirable to make an experiment to determine the question of whether or not trees could be made to grow. As a matter of fact very considerable success has been met in the Kansas National Forest, and I have understood that a great many of the trees planted in the Nebraska forest had also grown.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, we seem to be getting a considerable confusion of information. We are told in one breath that this land is leased for grazing of cattle and sheep, and in another breath that it is made up of sand hills.

Mr. SCOTT. There is no inconsistency in those statements. [Laughter.] The grass grows over the hills and between the hills, and I presume that the areas used for experimental purposes, to determine whether trees will grow, have been fenced in so that the outside range could be used for grazing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I can make a brief statement which will perhaps anticipate some of his questions, and which may give to the House information it might like to have in passing upon this amendment. The detailed estimate for the Nebraska National Forest, which consists of 556,072 acres, is as follows: Salary, 1 supervisor, $1,700; 1 deputy supervisor, $1,300; 1 clerk, at $900, four months, $300; 1 ranger, $1,100; 4 rangers, at $1,000, $4,000; 3 rangers, at $900, six months, $1,350; station, field, and traveling expenses, $1,500; forest planting $7,000.

It will be seen, therefore, that nearly one-half of the estimated appropriation for this forest is to be expended in tree planting, carrying out the suggestion of a moment ago, that the purpose of withdrawing the reserve in the first instance was to test the question as to whether trees could be grown in that latitude or not.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I assume from the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LATTA]—and he seemed to speak with knowledge on the subject and with deep conviction—that as a matter of fact the cattle and sheep were ranging on the land that was supposed to be in the reserve, in order that trees may grow upon it. The gentleman from Nebraska is upon his feet. What is the fact?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, these reserves are in the semiarid regions and no tree will grow there until the country is irrigated, and there is not water sufficient to irrigate that country now. That is the reason.

Mr. SCOTT. I will ask the gentleman whether it is a fact that there are any trees growing there?

Mr. LATTA. Along the stream that runs through it, skirting the stream, there are a few trees and a little brush. There are two forest reserves there and on one of them I do not think there is a single sprout of anything growing.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman know whether any trees have been planted on either of those reservations?

Mr. LATTA. No; I do not.

Mr. SCOTT. I will state to the House that I have been shown photographs that represented quite an extensive grove of pine trees that were represented to the committee to be growing on this Nebraska reservation.

Mr. LATTA. Yes; but if they started that or planted trees there and leased the ground out for ranging of sheep and cattle there will not be any young trees there. They will not let them grow.

Mr. SCOTT. Might not the trees be inclosed with a fence?

Mr. LATTA. They could be, perhaps, with a woven-wire fence, but not with a barbed-wire fence.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, whether there is any fence around them?

Mr. LATTA. No.

Mr. SCOTT. Has the gentleman ever been on the reservation?

Mr. LATTA. Never on the reservation. I know there is no timber there.

Mr. SCOTT. What information has the gentleman that that is so?

Mr. LATTA. Oh, the information that anybody would get from a general knowledge of the country. I have lived there ever since before white people went there.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think it would be very important to learn, if it is possible, to raise forests out there?

Mr. LATTA. Yes; it is very important. The eastern part, or the part of the State that is settled by the people of the State, has trees growing upon it, for every man has grown a grove there. There are four times as much timber in the State of Nebraska now as there was before the first white man went there.

Mr. MANN. Not where these forest reserves are.

Mr. LATTA. No; not where these forest reserves are.

Mr. MANN. There is a territory where land is not very valuable for any purpose. I will say to the gentleman, I have been strongly urging upon the Forest Service that they ought to make experiments to see whether it is not possible to raise trees on some of the territory out there—I guess it is not regarded as bad land——

Mr. LATTA. Well, it is sandy, dry, semiarid country.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Because I think, perhaps, the land will be valuable for other purposes, and if it be demonstrated that it be possible to raise trees upon the land where lumber is very much needed it will be one of the greatest services which the forest reserve can perform, and I hope they will be able to make such experiments to determine that question.

Mr. LATTA. But is not it cheaper and better if you want to grow timber to put it on land that will produce timber in a reasonable time? That land is so poor it will not grow a merchantable saw log in five hundred years. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. That may all be. The Government can not afford to enter into endeavors to raise forests on land where it is possible to raise grain crops or beef cattle. Now, if that territory out there be of such a character that it is profitable to raise grain, it would be absurd to try to raise trees, but if that be land where it is impossible to raise grain, where the land is worthless for any other purpose, where the Forest Service believes it may be practicable that they can keep out the fire and raise trees upon it, suppose it should take five hundred years; but it will not take that long.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, while these reservations are in the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, they are several hundred miles from where I live, and happen to be outside of the particular limits of my district, but, in a general way, I think I can give the House some information upon the amendment which will be of value when you come to cast your vote. These reservations are in a part of Nebraska known as the sand-hill country. It is true, on account of the lay of the land, that it can not be irrigated, at least, by any system yet devised. There are valleys where there are artesian wells and plenty of water and sometimes lakes, and the soil will raise anything if you had sufficient moisture to put on it. Now, as I understand, the object of making forest reservations in this country was to ascertain whether it was not possible to grow some kind of tree upon this land, and to experiment with the view of securing a tree that would grow there; perhaps not to make merchantable timber, at least, to begin with, but along that line of experimentation. I understand that the scheme upon which this Forest Service is based is with the idea of making some use of this land that heretofore had not been used for any practical purpose outside of grazing. It was government land, and had not been homesteaded; that was being used by cattle and sheep men without any recompense, without any payment to the Government for such use. And while I have not been in either one of these forest reserves I have read a good deal about them, and I have seen pictures taken of the methods which were being used in the way of experimentation. There is no doubt, in my judgment, but what good timber could be raised if water could be supplied, and there have been some efforts made, as I understand, to supply water in some of these ranges by artesian wells. I do not know whether the Government has done that particular work or not. As I understand it—and I still believe it to be true, but not in such a way I could testify, but just in a general way from the reading of some reports and some newspaper articles, and by talking in a general way with men who travel back and forth and know something about it—I have always been of the opinion that the pastures which were rented out to the sheepmen or to the cattlemen were those parts that were either fenced, or in localities that could be fenced. There are some places, as I said, where there are valleys, fertile valleys, and other places, where there are hills, upon which there is practically no grass growing.

Now, gentlemen smile at that statement, but I want to say that I do not think they have ever been on one. I know that on one of these reservations, in localities in the West, in my own State, and one in my own district, where I was shown a mountain of white sand as high as the ceiling of this room, and there was a man living close by who was cultivating land worth $75 an acre growing as good alfalfa as ever grew upon ground. They had planted these scrub trees, which held the sand, and made good soil where there was nothing but a barren area. They set out sticks and they gathered up the sand deeper and deeper around them. The sand is very fertile. These scrub trees would grow, and the result of that was that where they made these mounds they would have an additional soil in that locality where they will be able to grow crops; and on some of that soil they are growing alfalfa to-day. The soil, as I have already stated, in these localities is sandy and will blow away, and they plant these trees to prevent the shifting of it by the wind. It has been my understanding in a general way that the Forest Service in this country where these reserves were is trying to redeem some of the land along these lines. They were going to raise on some portions of it, perhaps, trees that would be in the nature of an experiment, it is true, but with the idea of raising timber in some cases, timber that would become merchantable, and in other cases of using the balance of the land for the purpose of getting some revenue for the Government where heretofore it had paid none. Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. I desired merely to state that when he appeared before the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. Pinchot said that about 50 or 60 per cent of the trees planted in the sand hills of the Nebraska reservation had lived.

Mr. NORRIS. From my own observation in other localities I would say that that is not a bad estimate.

Mr. GAINES. How long has this Nebraska National Park reservation been in existence?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not remember.

Mr. GAINES. Have any trees ever been planted there?

Mr. NORRIS. I think I can, without going and looking at the trees, answer that question in the affirmative, that there have been trees planted there.

Mr. GAINES. Then, I suppose, the original design was not to plant them for the purpose of growing timber, but in the hope of getting little scrub trees to grow and hold the sand together.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be partially true; it is not known exactly what kind of timber would grow best in that immediate locality. It is somewhat of an experiment, the same that has been tried in a great many other places where they have forest reserves without any timber. If we could get timber to grow in these localities, if scrub trees would grow, it would gradually redeem a country now almost worthless. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that while I can not tell of my own knowledge at this time, and do not claim to be an expert as to just what our policy should be in regard to these reserves, I want to say, in all fairness and justice, you should not pick out one and treat it differently from all the rest unless you find the policy is wrong, and then cut them all off.

Mr. GAINES. Does the gentleman know what is the extent of this experiment?

Mr. NORRIS. I have only a general knowledge of it, but in a general way I know that they have planted a great deal out there; I do not know with what success, to be positive about it, and I can not say what the result of that experiment has been.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, there is in my district, in the western portion of it, a forest reserve similar to that which has been talked about by the gentlemen who have preceded me. I want to say to the members of the committee that this reservation has proved of great benefit to the people of our section of the State. In the first place, the bureau is searching throughout the country and finding out the kind of trees that will grow upon these sand hills. They are bringing the seeds or cuttings of those species to this reserve; and I want to say to gentlemen who have insisted that these reserves are of no value, that they are growing trees on the Garden City Reserve—that there is no question about it being a success. It is true that as yet these reserves have not been long established, but sufficient experiment has been made to establish their practical value. They have a nursery at Garden City, where they grow young trees from the seed and then take them out into the sand hills and plant them, and they are growing. A large percentage of them are living. It is entirely possible to grow jack pine and other species of trees in those sand hills, and the Government is actually doing it.

The educational value to the people who live in the communities near a forest reserve like the Garden City Reserve is simply incalculable.

These people out on those treeless plains want to be told and have demonstrated to them what trees will grow there, and the influence in this forest is becoming to be felt all over the southwestern portion of Kansas.

I understand that this reserve that is under consideration is located in the western part of Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. In the northwestern portion.

Mr. MADISON. Where the conditions are practically the same as in western Kansas. I simply want to add my testimony to that of the gentleman who has just spoken, to the effect that these reserves are of great value to the localities in which they are situated. The land that is being planted is not of much good for anything except the growing of trees of the kind and character that are being planted there.

Mr. GAINES. What kind of trees are they growing?

Mr. MADISON. I mentioned one kind, the jack pine.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is the jack pine good for anything except Christmas trees?

Mr. MADISON. I want to say to my friend that there is no tree on earth that has brought so much happiness to mankind as the Christmas tree. [Applause and laughter.]

If the gentleman had lived in western Kansas and Nebraska, he would know what tree hunger is, and he would understand of what value even a scrub is to the people upon those windswept plains.

It is also true that this land which is now being planted to forests, if you take it out of the jurisdiction of the Forestry Bureau, will simply be turned out to the commons. As it is now, it is leased to cattlemen for grazing purposes, that portion that they have not reached in the tree planting. A large portion of the money obtained from these leases—I am not able to say what per cent—is covered into the local treasuries for the support of public schools and the building of good roads. If there was no other reason except that, it ought to be sufficient to keep these forest reserves in western Kansas and Nebraska going, and I sincerely hope that the motion to strike out will not prevail, but that this magnificent work that is being carried on by the Forestry Bureau in our section of the country will be continued. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I hardly know what would be the effect of the adoption of the present motion. I have listened for some time to this discussion, and I do not care to appear to be opposed to appropriations for the forest reserves. But if the theory is that we are going to keep our arid and timberless lands for forests to be grown thereon by nature, none of us now living can be particularly interested in it except in so far as we are interested for those who may come after us in remote ages.

Gen. William Henry Harrison, the great military man and statesman of long ago, who lived in a forest country for most of his life and before he was elected President of the United States, prepared an address on the subject of the time that it required nature to grow a forest of value.

He worked it out on strictly scientific principles, and in his address demonstrated that the great forests that we had in Ohio and Indiana and in regions of the country he was most familiar with, and in a country well adapted to the growth of a forest of value for useful purposes, took two hundred years. There was an evolution about it, the growth of something that disappeared, and then something else, and finally a forest of a valuable kind grew in one locality, different from that in another within sight of it. This was what he called working out by natural law a forest evolution. If we expect to keep our arid and timberless public lands for nature to make forests in the future, it will be with results at a very remote period. I do not think that the devastation of timber growths by fire in the grass that grew upon the plains was the only reason why there were not forests in all this great western domain. I have had some experience with forests on public lands. About 1868 I purchased some land in the district now represented by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the Big Bend of the Republican River, and it had the finest timber on it of any place in all that region. Everything looked beautiful and promising. I had some timber land and some bottom land and some hill land, and I looked forward to the time when it would be a very choice place to settle and establish a home. There was but one man, and he was from Prussia, that lived anywhere near it. He is still living.

I went out about twenty years later with a view to its settlement and there wasn't any timber as big as my thumb on any part of it. The very roots were dug out of the ground by the homesteaders of Kansas and Nebraska to build fires in their dugouts all through that country. [Laughter.] And they were right about it. There were no railroads to bring coal to them and they took the fuel where it was handiest, and I never complained about it. That land was then regarded as worthless—it was located in what was once called the Great American Desert—but to-day much of it is worth $100 an acre for farming purposes, to raise corn, wheat, oats, rye, alfalfa, and other things of that kind that we can utilize. I am glad to say that I have some of that land yet.

Mr. NORRIS. We would like to have the gentleman come out and live on it.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to say one thing more. That it is land suitable for forests that will be made valuable by proper planting and cultivation. I have a young grandson now in the university at Lincoln. He went out early last spring, down on some of the land I have referred to, and planted above 8,000 trees, with the help of a boy to assist him. He said it cost him, as I recollect, about 4 or 5 cents apiece to plant them. He is going to have a forest there some of these days.

I can tell you how he planted them. He laid out the ground like he was going to plant corn, 4 feet apart in rows, with cross rows. He planted a tree in each indicated place, as you would plant corn. Some might say that 4 feet apart is too close for successful timber growth, but they are mistaken; trees thus planted will grow better when close together while young and they will grow up straighter than when planted wider apart, and when they are big enough to cut for wire-fence posts they can be cut out, every other one, and the others remaining can grow until they are big enough for ties for railroads and for other purposes. After a while a forest will be produced; and that is the only way you will ever get a forest of any useful kind upon the now timberless regions of our great West. You have got to cultivate them, and you are not going to get a forest in our day on these lands by waiting for nature alone to produce it, nor will nature alone produce it in the lifetime of our children or our grandchildren.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this forest reserve to which the amendment applies is in the district that I have the honor to represent, I feel that I ought to contribute my personal knowledge to this discussion.

Mr. SCOTT. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question which will tend to remove some confusion in the minds of the members of the committee?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the most of the Members understood the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LATTA] to say that the reserve was in his district.

Mr. LATTA. I did not say that, and I did not mean to convey that idea. I said it was in my State.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. I should not have challenged him to offer the amendment that he did if I had not got the idea that it was in his district.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, there are three forest reserves in the district I represent, a district covering more than one-third of the great area comprising the State of Nebraska. There is room for these three reservations, as well as for the thousands of productive farms, with prosperous and happy homes, which do actually exist within this area. I deem it my duty to inform the committee as to my knowledge of the character of these reservations and the soil. The soil, if there be any soil in the greater portion of it, is very poor. The territory selected in the one of the three reservations which is most advanced with experiments was selected on account of its consisting mostly of large sand dunes. There is no system or order to these dunes; they are promiscuous. There are no valleys; they are great, high sand dunes and then pockets between them. There is no valley that you can follow in any direction. It is a deep pocket here, and over the dune is another deep pocket, and so on, and this topography is deemed the most desirable by the Forestry Department, for the reason that these high dunes with the deep pockets protect the trees from the hot winds and shelter them in the several respects which are desirable.

Now, where the principal reserve is most of the land comprehended within it consists of such topography as I have stated. It is well adapted, peculiarly adapted, to the experiments being made, and is little fit for anything else except for grazing.

Now, I wish to be frank and say that I think there has been too much comprehended in one of these forest reserves in our State. I have received a great many requests that I make an effort to have some of that turned back, and if I had been early enough to secure a consultation with the Chief of the Forestry Bureau before this was set apart I am sure he would not have included the better lands in this reservation which were set aside and that he would not have made the recommendation to the Secretary of the Interior, which was done. This reserve is called the North Platte Reserve.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Let me finish this statement. But in the main most of the lands comprehended in the other two reserves are quite well adapted to the experiment of pine-tree growing. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state what provision is made by the State of Nebraska for its forest reserves?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. By the State?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; does the State make any provision for the protection of its forests?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. The State is doing nothing with the forest reserves.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then it has no state reserves?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It is public domain, and the State has nothing whatever to do with it. I should speak further for the information of the committee of an object lesson as to the feasibility of reforesting that country if the country was ever forested in the first place. An object lesson exists in the county of my residence, which is farther east than where these three forest reserves are. Sixteen or seventeen years ago jack pines, such as grow in northern Michigan and Wisconsin, were set out under the advice of the state administration and under the personal direction of one of the leading scientific foresters of our State and of the West, the late Professor Bessey. Something like 3 acres were planted in the first place, but a fire ran over the country and destroyed a good portion of it, so that there is at least 1 acre which has on it standing trees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent for only a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. At least an acre of trees remains in a compact body, and are all promising trees and promise to make fair saw timber, perhaps good lumber for commercial purposes. They look as promising for that purpose as does the timber of the same age, as I would estimate it, in forests which have been successfully devoted to the manufacture of lumber for the best markets. I think as this experiment has been started by the Government and advanced thus far, it ought to be continued for a period longer at least, and my observation convinces me that it would be an excellent long-time investment for capitalists or the Government to plant trees upon such lands just as is being undertaken in western Nebraska in two of these particular reserves.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the motion to amend by striking out this $18,000 item intended to be used in the further support of experiments on these Nebraska forest reserves may be voted down.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this amendment close in seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that general debate on the amendment close in seven minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I became a settler of what was known as the "Great American Desert" a great many years ago, and I have spent practically all my life in that desert. I think that a good many of the remarks made here indicate that many eastern and southern people have not yet become acquainted with what is being done in that country. For instance, I remember the time that trees were set out in that western country, when nine-tenths, if not ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people were quite sure they would not grow. Some of those same trees have been cut into saw logs at least ten years since, and at a good profit. I speak of this, because I think my friend from Ohio, General KEIFER, is very much mistaken about the time it takes to grow trees. It could not have been over twenty-five years from the time they were planted until they were cut into saw logs at a great profit—saw logs that would measure from 2 to 3 feet in diameter at the butt.

Mr. MANN. Were they cottonwood trees?

Mr. REEDER. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. What tree was that?

Mr. REEDER. Cottonwood. Sometimes we plant what is known as the Carolina poplar. It is a variety of the cottonwood.

I wish to speak for a moment as to the quality of soil of that desert as we knew it on our maps, because I perceive that some of the eastern Members have very little idea of the fertility of that country. I was traveling along a certain place in western Kansas back in 1876, and it occurred to me that I had gotten far enough West; that it was impossible white men could ever live there on account of a sand storm that occurred that day. I did not go back to that section for at least twenty years, and when I did I found a most beautiful little city within a mile and a half or 2 miles of where I had seen the sand storm, and every part of the country was covered with finer farms than you see any place east of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it does a man good to get out of West Virginia or Pennsylvania or Ohio into that American Desert to see where people live comfortably on a farm, and I often wonder that these gentlemen do not go and see what has been done with the American Desert. That is why I have stood here day after day, and I wish I had more ability, in an effort to prevent the gobbling up of such an amount of this western land by speculators which ought to go into the hands of settlers as it did in Kansas and Nebraska, and thus make of this intermountain country what it ought to be—a paradise for farmers.

Some years ago, quite a number, I among others, did a great deal of irrigation in western Knasas. We spent a good deal of money and made the land valuable, but conditions have changed there to such an extent that there is no irrigation in my district. We simply had to quit because our cultivation and tree planting have produced such an atmospheric condition that the rains come more frequently, so that we raise good crops on the land in that section and we have quit irrigation for that reason. Another thing occurred in that Great American Desert which will surprise some of you. It is the fact that there are 30 or more trees growing naturally, that nature planted, to where there was one when we settled in that country. Some forty years ago a few trees grew along the borders of the streams, as indicated by my friend from Nebraska, but, unassisted, nature has produced at least 30 trees for every one that was growing before, in addition to what we have cut for fuel when we could not secure coal. We could not get coal in the early days on account of the distance to a railroad; corn was also burned in great quantities for lack of other fuel in that country. We cut out the large trees along the streams in places where they had grown by being thus protected from fire. Much has been done to make that the finest farming country on earth by the discovery of plants that will prosper under the conditions as they exist now in that desert.

I have replanted the trees four different times on my home place, because I did not know the kind of trees to plant under the existing conditions. We are now learning what to plant; we are learning the kinds that succeed best. Pines and cedars will grow in the sand hills, and in time they, in connection with cultivation, will render that intermountain and sand-hill country as fertile a country as the locality in which I live. Some of this land in the section where I reside that appeared to be absolutely worthless years ago is now worth and will sell for $100 an acre for what grows out of the ground in the way of farm products, and I doubt whether any section east of Illinois will grow as much grass to the acre as some of this land in the so-called "American Desert." I know of places where they grow five crops of alfalfa each year without irrigation, and they do not exceed that in Virginia, Ohio, or Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt in the world that that is better land than that which we have, but the accurate, minute description of the land which the gentleman suggests does not indicate it.

Mr. REEDER. It exactly indicates what the country was when it was first settled, and the later description indicates what it is now after forty years of cultivation—a much finer looking country than I have ever seen any place east of Illinois.

It is very much to be deplored that when we have made what was a desert when Illinois was first settled the most productive wheat belt in the world and at the same time one of the greatest corn, cattle, and hog producing sections of the United States, that men who are intelligent enough to be sent to Congress are yet doubtful of the expediency of still experimenting with other portions of our arid and semiarid lands.

Then it is even more to be regretted that other Members of this House who do know of the development of the West should display such energy to prevent a proper care of the resources of the people as to attempt to cut the expense of forest preservation below 2½ cents per acre, when other countries, such as France, Germany, and England, spend as many dollars per acre as we do cents annually to care for and conserve their forests. Switzerland spends annually $5 per acre in the care of her forests, and she is now, after about seventy-five years of scientific care, able to cut from those same forests about $10 worth per acre per annum, or a net profit of $5 per acre per annum without depletion. Such a condition in our forests, handled as well, would give us a net profit of $1,000,000,000 a year, or enough to run the Government without so much as a tariff law, a revenue law, or even the sale of a postage stamp. And we need only to use such a portion of our country for forests as is unfit for cultivation on account of the roughness of its surface.

While it will take years to bring our forests to the condition of those in Germany or Switzerland, we are, under the Agricultural Department, moving in that direction.

These forests if protected and propagated will largely pay the necessary expense of their care in retarding floods, preventing soil erosion, and the filling of our streams with sediment, and thus regulating largely the stream flow for use in water powers, our most valuable source of heat, light, and power in the not distant future.

How these Members can be induced to commit so great a crime against posterity for the trivial profit to be taken out of these resources and put into the pockets of rich speculators is beyond my ken. If these lands and the profits of these resources of timber, coal, and water powers could go in small amounts into the possession of families of limited means, we could look with some complacence on the efforts to wring them from the possession of the Government. But when they simply mean the adding of a few hundred thousand or a million or two to the wealth of a few whose already accumulated fortunes makes it scarcely possible for them to raise families who are not criminals, makes these efforts seem doubly to be condemned. We occupy the last and most favorable spot on earth for a great nation, evidently hidden for thousands of years from civilized man by that power which overrules the destinies of men and nations until man was brought to as high a state of civilization as could be produced under the existing conditions. Then God permitted its discovery, and through great trials sorted out the best of that civilization and sent them to the stormy New England coast to found the civilization we are called to promote for the good of the whole human race.

Let us get above the miserly grabbing for a few sordid dollars for either ourselves or our constituents; gather information as to our God-given resources and opportunities, and act solely in the interest of bringing our citizenship to the very highest level of general intelligence, uprightness, and contentment that has ever been attained by any people on God's footstool.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LATTA] to say that this forest reserve is in his district. Evidently I misunderstood him, and it was while under that wrong impression that I accepted his proposition not to oppose the amendment which he might offer to strike out this appropriation. I was quite willing to let him offer that upon his own responsibility as the Representative of the district in which, as I understood at the time, the forest is located, and present the matter for the judgment of the House. But since I have now learned that the forest is in the district of another Representative from Nebraska, who protests most earnestly against striking out the appropriation, I feel as if I am warranted in expressing the hope to the committee that the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

White River National Forest, $19,990.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, having reached the portion of this bill pertaining to the forest reserves within the State of Colorado, I ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes to say something concerning these forest reserves. I will not attempt to go into details, but merely offer a few general observations upon pending and proposed legislation affecting the public domain of the West. Whether we like them or not, the forest reserves are there, and I am frank to say they are doing some good.

We, of the West, heartily join with you of the East, North, and South in every honest effort at the conservation of our natural resources. We do not question the patriotic motives of the President of the United States, or the good intentions of the Secretary of the Interior; and I have not impugned the honesty of purpose of Gifford Pinchot. I have for many years differed very widely from him in his methods of handling the forest reserves within my State. But, Mr. Chairman, what I seriously object to, and what I think every man in the arid West who understands the situation will or ought to object to, is the constantly increasing assumption of authority by the Forest Service. If the Forest Service would confine its operations to forestry and to forest lands, and the legitimate conservation of the forests thereon, all good citizens would commend and uphold their efforts. We want to see everything conserved that ought to be conserved, and we want to see all of our natural resources safeguarded and economically developed and used; and as a member of the Public Lands Committee, I shall gladly assist in the framing of as strict laws as anyone could reasonably ask to accomplish those objects and prevent the fraudulent acquisition of any of the public domain, and also prevent the monopoly of any of the coal, material, and other valuable resources of our country, pending the time that they are lawfully passing into private ownership.

But if the term "conservation" is being used, as I fear it is in some quarters, as a pretext for the increase and creation of powers that have never heretofore been granted by law; if a laudable sentiment is being insidiously used as a cover for the enactment of a code of land laws that will perpetually exploit the public domain and its resources in our Western States, I feel that I would be recreant to the people who have honored me by election to this distinguished body if I did not raise my voice in earnest protest.

Never before in the history of this country has there been such a systematic and determined effort upon the part of the Federal Government toward infringements upon the rights of the West. While it is true, as the President in his message to the Senate and House on the 14th of last month well stated, that "all the principal land statutes were enacted more than a quarter of a century ago," and while it is also probably true that the country needs a new code of land laws, and probably a land court also, that will properly safeguard the rights of the Government in the disposition of its coal, mineral, forest, and other property rights, at the same time, when we come to consider the numerous bills and measures that are presented to this Congress for that laudable purpose, several of which have the official sanction of the administration, I am amazed at the boldness of the proposals therein contained. I can not realize how the Members of this honorable House from the older States can calmly consider the propositions to absolutely take from the people of the arid west some of the most sacred property rights they have, not only reversing the tradition of this Government for a hundred years, but violating the very constitutional guaranties upon which those States were admitted into this Union. In the brief time allowed me I can not go into details, but I will mention a few of these measures, and as the water of the arid west is the most precious and valuable property right we have, I will mention that first.

On July 26, 1866, for the purpose of inducing immigration to and settlement of the West, and for the protection of property rights therein, Congress passed the following act:

> Whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed; but whenever any person, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injures or damages the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage. (Rev. Stat., 2339.)

For the purpose of further guaranteeing and protecting the western settlers in their property rights and rights of way for their ditches and water rights, on July 9, 1870, Congress passed the following act:

> All patents granted or preemptions or homesteads allowed shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section. (Rev. Stat., 2340.)

Neither one of those acts have ever been repealed from that day to this. They were the foundation upon which many billions of dollars worth of property was made by many years of toil and privation, and upon which that property has securely rested for nearly a half a century.

On the 3d day of March, 1875, Congress passed the enabling act, permitting the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado to frame and submit its constitution for admission to the Union. Section 1 of the enabling act reads as follows:

> That the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a state government, with the name of the State of Colorado, which State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respect whatsoever, as hereinafter provided.

In pursuance of that enabling act the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado adopted a constitution on the 14th of March, 1876, and submitted it. Paragraphs 5 and 6 of article 16 of that constitution which was submitted to this Government are as follows:

> Water public property.—The water of every natural stream not heretofore appropriated within the State of Colorado is hereby declared to be the property of the public, and the same is dedicated to the use of the people of the State, subject to appropriation as hereinafter provided.
> Right of appropriation.—The right to divert unappropriated waters of any natural stream for beneficial uses shall never be denied. Priority of appropriation shall give the better right as between those using the water for the same purpose, but when the waters of any natural stream are not sufficient for the service of all those desiring the use of the same, those using the water for domestic purposes shall have the preference over those claiming for any other purpose, and those using the water for agricultural purposes shall have the preference over those using the same for manufacturing purposes.

That constitution, with those provisions therein, was formally approved, and President Grant on August 1, 1876, signed and issued the proclamation making Colorado the centennial State of this Union. That enabling act and those two provisions within our constitution were an absolutely binding and forever inviolate contract between this Government and the State of Colorado. Probably one-half of the property value of our entire State has been built and based upon those provisions. You of the East have little conception of what water rights mean to us of the West.

The act of June 4, 1897, establishing the forest reserves, also contained the following provision:

> The jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, over persons within such reservations shall not be affected or changed by reason of the existence of such reservations, except so far as the punishment of offenses against the United States therein is concerned, the intent and meaning of this provision being that the State wherein any such reservation is situated shall not, by reason of the establishment thereof, lose its jurisdiction nor the inhabitants thereof their rights and privileges as citizens, or be absolved from their duties as citizens of the State.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46–118) and all of the other decisions of that court upon the subject during the past forty years have emphatically declared:

> That the Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that all powers not granted are reserved to the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State, except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is vetsed in the State.

We have no navigable streams within the State of Colorado. The doctrine of riparian rights never did prevail in our country. All the waters of our streams became the property of the people when our State was admitted into the Union, and from the 1st day of August, 1876, up to this hour neither this Government nor Congress has ever had any right whatever to interfere with or exercise any jurisdiction over one drop of water within the boundaries of Colorado. Our State was admitted upon an absolute equality with every other State in this Union. Congress has no right to interfere with our property rights or our local self-government any more than it would with any other State; and I can not resist feeling that such an effort would not be attempted against the older States. But now, for the first time in the history of this Government, the President recommends not only the control of the power sites, but also the waters within our States.

The conservation press of the country some time ago, with great unanimity, raised a great furore and bugaboo about gigantic power-site combinations and monopolies in the West. Magazines have been teeming with articles clamoring for the conservation of power sites and of the Nation's valuable water rights. This Nation has no water rights in the West. They belong to the people of those States. While the right-of-way act of Congress of 1901, under which rights of way for canals and ditches, and so forth, are now obtained over government land, through the office of the Secretary of the Interior, had the effect of superseding the right-of-way provision in the latter part of the act of 1866, in so far as it did not affect vested rights, the first official action taken by the Government toward asserting its claim to water-power sites and withdrawing land for that purpose was a year ago in January, when over three and a half million acres of the public domain were hurriedly withdrawn from all forms of entry or disposition for the purpose of "the conservation of water resources." As a matter of the fact, the Government has never had any "water resources" whatever within the State of Colorado since the 1st day of August, 1876.

While a large portion of that land has been restored to entry, at the same time there are still large tracts of land that do not contain any power sites which ought to be open to settlement. Even the President does not claim there was any authority of law for the withdrawal of these lands from appropriate entry. I want to again insist that we do not question the good faith or the patriotic motives of our President. He is candid and frank, and we admire him for it, while I do not feel the same way toward some who seem to be so desperately determined to get more revenue from the West. But I can not resist the belief that both the President and the Secretary of the Interior are being unconsciously influenced by this simultaneous agitation for conservation throughout the eastern press and by the hobgoblins that have been manufactured about the gigantic frauds in the West.

I am aware it is expressly stated that these withdrawals are only temporary and for the purpose of affording Congress an opportunity to legislate upon the subject; but it is from these measures now pending before Congress that we must infer what character of legislation is contemplated and desired. We obtain this not only from the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and which was recently placed before us, but also from several bills now pending before the Senate and House, sent in by the President himself. It would take too long to go into these propositions in detail, because they are lengthy and ingenuous. Their proposals, in plain English, amount to a systematic effort to capitalize into an enormous and permanent federal revenue-producing proposition practically all of the remaining natural resources upon the public domain, including the use of the waters of the streams of all the Western States. It is boldly proposed to hereafter charge a rental or royalty for the right to carry water across public land and for the use of the public land for reservoirs or power sites, and only grant an easement for a limited period, with a maximum of thirty years, which may be renewed only at the option of the Government.

The intention is to make that apply to not only the 200,000,000 acres within the forest reserves, but also to the 603,355 acres of public land outside of the forest reserves, and which is now withdrawn, as claimed, for the purpose of "the conservation of the water resources" thereon. The idea appears to be to have the Federal Government permanently retain title to all of such lands as can be used for these purposes, with the deliberate intention of deriving a perpetual revenue therefrom in that manner.

But to my mind, the most outrageous proposition, which in itself concedes the violation of all our laws and constitutional rights, is the requirement to compel every man who contemplates using any water for power purposes to first secure his right by appropriation and with the proper plans and specifications and diligent completion of his development and then convey it to the Government of the United States and receive in return therefor a lease, as above stated, and agree to thereafter pay a royalty for the temporary permission to use his own plant and the water which he has appropriated therefor.

This Government entered into a solemn compact with each of the Western States and induced the people to settle in and build up those States upon the surrender of its title to and jurisdiction over all of the waters therein, and admitted each State into the Union with the constitutional guaranties that the waters therein should forever belong to the people thereof, subject to appropriation; and now, when practically every drop of water within the boundaries of every one of those Western States has been lawfully appropriated and is now being beneficially used, it proposes to coerce the people who may seek further to develop our Commonwealths into surrendering those constitutional guaranties and making themselves perpetual federal tenants.

Were I not a new Member of this honorable body, I would characterize this proposed legislation in terms much stronger than I feel it would be appropriate for me now to use. But I will say that I heartily coincide with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] when, the other day, in referring to this subject on the floor of this House, he said:

> I think I am justified in saying that whatever our various opinions may be as to the wisdom, justice, propriety, or necessity of legislation such as that proposed herein, all those who are familiar with our land legislation and the decisions of the courts with regard to our public domain must admit that it is the most revolutionary and startling proposition relating to federal control of local affairs, through the ownership of public lands, ever presented to Congress. It is so startling and so revolutionary that I must of necessity speak of it earnestly and emphatically, and in doing so I desire to have it understood that I speak with due respect to the very able and efficient Secretary who made this recommendation and for the views of all those in official or private life who honestly agree with him. All those who have been demanding federal control of power development owe the Secretary a debt of gratitude for having put their demands in concrete form.

I take the liberty of making this reference to the able chairman of the Public Lands Committee, first, because he knows the conditions of the West and the needs of our people as well, if not better, than any man in this House; and, second, to show that this is not a question of politics nor of men. It is a bold attempt to trample upon a principle which lies at the foundation of a republican form of Government. It is a most menacing attempt by the power of numbers to force the Western States, as the price of the opportunity for the future development of their resources, to surrender one of the most sacred rights they have guaranteed to them by their organic laws. It is a brazen denial of the "equal footing" upon which they entered this Union, and I can not believe that the people of the West will tamely submit to such an outrage, nor do I believe the courts would enforce it.

I am fully aware that if the Federal Government desires to retain title to the lands that have not thus far been disposed of, and thus retard the development of the country, it may, of course, do so. But the Government has no constitutional, legal, or moral right whatever to exercise jurisdiction over or interfere with the use of the waters of the nonnavigable streams within our borders; and this attempt to invade the inherent rights of the citizens of the Western States not only applies to water for power purposes, but also to its use for irrigation.

The value of the waters of the West for irrigation is probably a hundred times what it is for power purposes. And yet the water power of the mountain streams of my State alone, when properly harnessed, will generate a million horsepower. It is authoritatively stated that 1 horsepower, operated every day in the year, turns out an average of $1,152 in manufactured articles, and that the average wage paid annually per horsepower is $248.

From this mere reference it can be readily seen what marvelous possibilities there are to our State in our water resources. The question involved is whether Colorado or the Federal Government shall own and control that almost inconceivable wealth and derive the $248,000,000 annually therefrom.

But there are apparently innumerable schemes for interfering with our rights of self-government in the West. I have not had time or opportunity to read all of the various bills that seem to have for their purpose the interference with our domestic affairs and the insidious filching of money by some pretext or other from us of the West. Some of them seem to have forgotten that our form of government contemplates the freest possible exercise of individual liberty consistent with the public good, and that the Government has no right to regulate every man's private business.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, has introduced a bill, H. R. 18834, which was referred to the other day, and which, I presume, is at least to a certain extent a semiadministration measure, and which is another illustration of the pending attempted infringement upon the property rights, as well as the governmental and constitutional rights, of the people of the West. As I understand it, that bill provides in substance that no dam can hereafter be built upon any stream adjoining which there is any remaining government land without the construction being under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he shall have all the power and the same authority as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers as to the construction and maintenance of dams in navigable waters, and that no dam can be constructed without the express authority of the Secretary of Agriculture; and that if such a dam is not within the forest reserve it would come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, who will have the same authority as the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to forest reserves and the Secretary of War over navigable waters. As was pointed out, if a farmer in the West hereafter wants to build a little earthen dam for a small reservoir to irrigate a piece of land or to run his churn, he would have to get permission of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, or both, and then probably have the Chief of Engineers of the War Department supervise the construction of his dam, for all of which the farmer would have to duly pay. I think I can imagine what some of my farmer friends would think of that kind of a law, if it should ever pass this Congress.

With all due respect to everyone, I can not appreciate the brotherly spirit exhibited in some of these measures presented by Members coming from the States that have been settled and built up by the leniency of this Government; States that had not one-tenth the hardships that the present frontier States have to endure, and that have been made rich by settlement and development during the past hundred years, and which now seek to hamper and place unwarranted burdens upon the new and needy States of the West. Moreover, it is also passing strange that none of these proposed measures for encroachments upon our rights, as I view them, come from people who are familiar with our conditions. To me these paternalistic and centralizing tendencies appear little short of national bureaucracy run mad. It would be no more unfair, unconstitutional, or illegal for the National Government to commence taxing and proceed to derive an enormous revenue from the use of navigable rivers and harbors, upon the theory that it retains a certain interest therein. Why does not some of the muckrakers work up a scare about an impending monopoly of the power sites of the streams of the East? Why does not some one discover the secret formation of a gigantic trust composed of all the navigable waters and frantically appeal to the Government to take them all over and charge the users of them $1,000,000,000 a year royalty for their conservation and preservation for the national good and for the welfare of future generations, and incidentally for a large number of new offices? I am heartily in favor of conservation, and I would especially like to see some conservation of law and of the constitutional rights of the people of the West. I want to see the conservation of a little old-fashioned honesty and fair dealing.

I can not see the justice, and there certainly is no necessity, for placing a burden of millions of dollars in taxes and royalties upon the development of the West for the maintenance of this Government. That looks to me like robbing children.

It seems to me that it is time the Western States were inquiring whether or not they are to hereafter be treated as equal members of this Union or to be relegated to the position of federal provinces and be governed by federal bureaus. It is a question as to whether or not our Western States are capable of controlling our internal affairs, or whether we are to have our property rights managed from Washington.

FOREST RESERVES.

I will not at this time attempt to take up the time of the House in discussing the hundreds of exasperating and impracticable rules and regulations now prevailing in the West in the Government's administration of the public domain, especially within the forest reserves. There are many things that seriously interfere with the settlement of the public domain and prevent the development of our country as we have a right to have it developed under the express and well-settled laws. We are being reigned over by an army of federal officers, many of them nonresidents, who are not in sympathy with the inhabitants of the public domain, and many of whom inevitably cause dissatisfaction.

I could right now offer in this record a hundred pages of newspaper editorials, resolutions, speeches, and letters to me vigorously protesting against existing conditions upon the public domain in Colorado alone. But I understand that there are at this time two grievance committees from my State on their way to Washington to present the situation to the proper departments and ask for relief, so I will not now go into a discussion of these matters.

It is a common saying that the timid never started West and the weak died on the way. I have spent nearly all of my life on the frontier. I know the hardships that the pioneers have had to endure to build up that country. History will record the fact that they have certainly done their full share toward making our country the magnificent Nation that it is, and we have a right to expect and to demand the same consideration at the hands of this Government that was accorded to the early settlers of the great States represented by you gentlemen from the Middle West.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman when he refers to the Government deriving revenues if he refers to leasing for the purpose of pasturage on some of these reservations?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I have reference to that in part only.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not true that this is entirely government land, owned by the Government of the United States, and if it were not thus leased it would not bring in revenue from anyone, and would be used without any compensation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My dear sir, did the people of Nebraska ever pay to this Government one dollar for the use of the public domain within its borders?

Mr. NORRIS. Not that I know of.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No, sir; you did not. None of the Middle States ever paid a dollar for using any of the grass on the public lands.

Mr. NORRIS. But if the Government of the United States owns lands in your State or mine, that prior to these reservations were used by people without giving compensation or paying any taxes, or anything, and those lands are now being leased and controlled by the Government, have we any right to complain that they are using their own property now and getting a revenue that is being put into the reserves for the purposes of improving them when part of it goes to the State as a matter of fact, and before that the State received nothing?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I just a few moments ago stated that when the States that we of the West represent came into the Union the enabling acts of Congress which admitted our States guarantee that each of them "shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever," and that the act of Congress establishing the forest reserves provides that—

> Jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, over persons within such reservations shall not be affected or changed by reason of the existence of such reservations, * * * the intent and meaning of this provision being that the State wherein any such reservation is situated shall not by reason of the establishment thereof lose its jurisdiction, nor the inhabitants thereof their rights and privileges as citizens * * * of the State.

It has been one of the important rights and privileges of the settlers of every State in this Union for a hundred years to use free of charge the public domain for the grazing of their stock, and why should not our cattle be allowed to eat government grass which would otherwise go to waste? It did not cost Uncle Sam a dollar, and why should the Government, now for the first time in a century, inflict a tax upon the people of the West for the grazing of that grass? And why should it be a criminal offense for a settler's cow to stray onto a forest reserve? I do not believe this great Government needs the 60 cents; nor do I believe it is justified in collecting that sum from the struggling settler for what grass each head of his stock can find on the arid public domain during each short summer.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield to me at this point?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman admits that it is government land?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, of course it is government land.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the right that the gentleman claims was possessed by the people of the State to use the grass on government land prior to the time they were put into forest reserves was only applied to a particular class of people, who succeeded without any legal right, as a matter of fact, to get possession, did not go to the inhabitants of the State as a class or as a whole. Now, is not that true?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Have not the Government and the public-land laws at all times invited the people to go West and settle up the frontier; and have not the pioneers of the frontier States always enjoyed the privilege of grazing the grass which would otherwise probably be burned?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but I might have a homestead on one side of the road and you, a large cattleman, might have two or three sections on the other side of the road; and you would not permit my cattle and sheep to graze on the land which you might be in possession of and of which, at the same time, possession was taken without any legal right and without paying the Government a penny for its use. Under the present regulations you would have to pay something and the Government would get the benefit of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, inasmuch as I have taken up much of it, and I apologize to the gentleman for so doing.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks for unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph close in five minutes. Is there any objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If I am only allowed five minutes, I must decline to be interrupted any further. The West does not object to the conservation of anything that ought to be conserved. The West has never opposed forest conservation. We earnestly want the timber carefully preserved, and we have no objection to forest reserves wherever there is any forest. But we do not want agricultural lands that are without timber to be permanently retained within forest reserves. We are not in favor of the conservation of sagebrush, cactus, and buffalo grass; and we have been for years appealing to the federal authorities and to Congress to have the agricultural portions of the forest reserves eliminated and surveyed and thrown open to settlement. We want to get the lands in the hands of the settlers. It is a mockery to retain within the forest reserves hundreds of thousands of acres of good agricultural land that has not had a tree on it for five hundred years, and upon which it would take five hundred years to grow a tree big enough to be of any use to the country. We have no use for fads, feudalism, or freak forestry.

There are nearly 16,000,000 acres now within the forest reserves in the State of Colorado, practically one-fourth of our State, and the press and the public and the legislature have officially stated that two-thirds of it is not forest land at all. Instead of eliminating any of it the Forest Service is desperately clamoring to have nearly a half million acres more added to the forest reserves. Fortunately, they can not do it without an act of Congress. There has been an amazing amount of misinformation, glittering generalities, and unemployed veracity concerning the reforestation of the mountains of the West. I think I put it mildly when I say that the universal sentiment of the West is that the claim of reforestation of the Rocky Mountains is one of the most gigantic humbugs that was ever attempted to be foisted upon intelligent people. I think it was Mark Twain who said, in referring to some visionary or scientific speculation, that it was—

> Very fascinating; one gets such wholesome returns of conjecture from such a trifling investment of facts.

The average altitude of the 18 forest reserves within the State of Colorado is about 9,000 feet, and a careful investigation has shown that at that altitude the average of tree growth for each 12 inches in diameter is: For red spruce, two hundred years; yellow pine, two hundred years; lodge-pole pine, three hundred years; and white spruce, four hundred years; so that it can be readily seen that it requires from a thousand to fifteen hundred years to grow a saw log. Moreover, my colleague Mr. MARTIN has conclusively and eloquently shown that there has thus far been pactically nothing done toward reforestation, or forestry either, within our State. In fact, it has been repeatedly stated that the school children of the country on Arbor Day plant more trees than the entire Forest Service does in the three hundred and sixty-five days of each year.

But be that as it may, that agricultural land is not needed within the forest reserves for any legitimate purpose. It will produce immense crops of oats, alfalfa, timothy, potatoes, small fruit, and many other products, and we want it taken out and have it surveyed and opened for settlement, and allow it, under definite laws and without harassing regulations, to be settled and become the homes of many thousands of good citizens. We want definite land laws, and not an ever-shifting set of rules and regulations subject to individual caprice. President Taft, in his message that I referred to a moment ago, well said that "no sane person can contend that it is for the common good that nature's blessings are only for unborn generations." The West heartily approves of that sentiment, and we earnestly hope that his administration and this Congress will carry it out. We want this generation to enjoy some of the blessings of the unimpeded development of the marvelous resources that nature has placed within the boundaries of our Western States.

If I have figured it correctly, we are to-day appropriating $5,043,700 for the 148 forest reserves in the United States and 2 in Alaska. Of that enormous sum, $405,430 goes toward the administration of the forest reserves within the State I have the honor to represent. I will not try to prevent the federal officers within my State from getting their share of this princely sum. With rare exceptions they are personally a fine set of young fellows. They are quite a cosmopolitan collection. I think that most of you gentlemen have constituents among them. But I confess my utter inability to comprehend where this Government is getting value received for all of that money. In addition to these vast appropriations, the Government proceeds to heap further charges upon our people to the amount, as I understand it, of about $1,800,000 a year, which is constantly increasing, for the use of the property that we feel Uncle Sam should gladly grant as an inducement to bring settlers into that country and build it up. But we do not object so much to these petty fees and charges as we do to the principle upon which they are charged and collected. As a matter of fact, you are, or ought to be, as much interested as we are in building up the West, and you can not do it by inflicting unnecessary taxes upon us and treating us as though we were a federal province or an object of legitimate prey. That is not good policy, and never has been the policy of this Government.

We most earnestly protest and object to what I understand is the contemplated policy of capitalizing our coal mines, our power sites, our oil and gas and asphaltum, and mineral resources, as well as timber and grass, and proceeding to lease everything within our borders to us for an enormous royalty. And I suppose some ingenious conservationist will soon be figuring on the capitalization of our Colorado climate and pure air and sunshine.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it true that the result of leasing has been to give the small cattle owner more chance at the public domain than he ever had before?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. That statement was repeatedly made in the hearing before the conservation commission, and that it resulted also in protecting the land and producing a better crop of grass instead of having it overstocked and thereby destroyed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In the regulation of the range I think the Forest Service has done some good, but as a matter of fact, it has put some good men out of business, and I think it has injured ten to every one it has materially benefited. It is true the forest people have prevented sheep and cattle wars in some places, and that has done a great deal of good. The Forest Service does some good in many ways. We are not objecting to it, except in so far as it retards development and imposes upon the settlers unnecessary burdens and impracticable regulations, and prevents the development of our country. We want the agricultural lands eliminated and surveyed and opened to settlement, not bottled up.

I noticed in the press that there are 70,000 citizens of this country who this year will immigrate to Canada and settle upon the public lands of that country because its land laws are more liberal than ours. They will take with them on an average of a thousand dollars apiece, which means $70,000,000 of good American money, besides 70,000 of as good people as there are in the world reluctantly expatriating themselves and going to a foreign country largely because of the lack of wisdom of this Government in the administration of its public domain. We would like to have them come to Colorado.

We want the impracticable restrictions removed from prospecting, and the inauguration of such regulations as will allow the development of our mining resources. Prospecting has practically ceased within the State of Colorado; there have been no more new Creedes or Cripple Creeks or other important mining camps developed since the public domain was taken possession of by the Forest Service.

We will heartily welcome such laws as will prevent land grabbers of every kind. We are more opposed than anyone else can be to the spoliation or monopoly of any of our immensely valuable resources. We want the timber conserved, not monopolized, and a government monopoly is not much better than any other.

If the bills are prepared by men who know the conditions of our country, and are drafted in the interest of the growth and development of the West instead of its exploitation, I care not how strict the requirements may be for guarding against frauds of every kind. But we insist upon what we believe to be our rights, that this property shall lawfully and orderly, and as speedily as may be reasonably possible, all go into private ownership and become the property of the residents of the States within which it is situated, and subject to taxation for the benefit of the States and counties therein. We believe that to be an inviolable right, and in every respect in accordance with the policy that has made this Nation what it is. We ask for nothing more and we expect nothing less. Even though it were not a violation of our rights, we do not believe it either practical or good policy for this Government to embark in the coal business, or the oil business, or the gas, or water power, or mining, or any other such business within our borders.

Some enthusiastic conservationists write as though the Western States were a new country just discovered and taken by conquest by this Government, and in which there are fabulous riches which the Government itself should immediately occupy by an army of new officers, appointed from outside of the territory, and should proceed to develop and handle that property and charge a 25 per cent royalty upon the use and enjoyment of it for the purpose of conserving it. Of course, that sounds absurd; but let me assure you that it does not sound any more strange or ridiculous to the East than some of the things we now hear sounds to us of the West.

Mr. SCOTT. Has the gentleman introduced a bill providing for the modification of the laws under which these reserves are now being administered?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. Does he know of any bill that has been introduced by anybody for that purpose?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I understand that the President has already had quite a number of them introduced. I want to say that Colorado and Wyoming are a unit on this proposition, and whenever you criticise the position of the chairman of the Public Lands Committee you are hitting us in Colorado.

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me that instead of airing his grievances on an agricultural appropriation bill, where the matter is not germane, the gentleman ought to bring in a bill and have the matter brought up squarely before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What position would a new and minority Member be in in trying to enact such legislation in this House?

Mr. SCOTT. If the legislation had merit, I am sure it would receive consideration in spite of the newness of the gentleman's membership.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We are going to give the President of the United States the benefit of believing that his intentions are for the best, and as far as his recommendations are practicable and for the welfare of the West we are going to heartily support him. There is not a particle of politics in this matter. It is a question of resisting the federal encroachments upon the rights of the West. We are simply insisting upon the God-given right of local self-government. That is the way we look at it.

We are going to give the President of the United States the benefit of believing that his intentions are for the best, and as far as his recommendations are practicable and for the welfare of the West we are going to heartily support him. There is not a particle of politics in this matter. It is a question of resisting the federal encroachments upon the rights of the West. We are simply insisting upon the God-given right of local self-government. That is the way we look at it.

Honest conservation is all right; but when it threatens to descend to an ingenious revenue-getting scheme, when it is apparently being used largely as a device to furnish offices and expend the public money, it is time the people who foot the bills should be consulted. Conservation should be conducted according to law and with the consent of the people most directly affected, instead of according to the ideas of sensational writers for eastern magazines.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored in a very hasty and disconnected way to give the House a composite reflection of what I believe to be the sentiment of the West. I do not expect some of my statements to escape the criticism of the ultra-partisan, or the few who hold federal jobs or specially advantageous permits or other favorable concessions. But I believe my statements voice the disinterested consensus of public opinion. The subject of the administration of the public domain is a question that is considered in nearly every issue of the press in the West. We are not a complaining nor fault-finding people. We recognize to the fullest extent the rights of and our obligations to the National Government, and we want to join in both the making and the execution of the laws pertaining to the West.

This is one of the greatest subjects before this country at the present time and will require the wisest and most conservative statesmanship to intelligently solve the problems as to how to rightly administer the public domain and also conserve our natural resources and not invade the rights of the Western States and their citizens.

It is an American instinct to have an individual opportunity and to establish a family heritage in the soil. Look at Oklahoma! A few days ago a barren Indian reservation; to-day one of the richest, most intelligent and prosperous States in this Union. All by reason of allowing American citizens to acquire an individual home and a portion of the public domain. We all want to encourage the settlement and development of the West. The East—in fact, the world—needs our products. If we could have a million farms cleared and put into cultivation within the next five years, it would be one of the greatest boons that could possibly come to this Nation.

The new States of the West need all of their natural and financial resources for their upbuilding and development. To deprive them of their natural wealth and then tax them for using it is to doubly impoverish them. The great States of the East have always utilized and are still enjoying the benefits of all of their lands and other resources within their borders.

In the case of coal, the profit of production stays to enrich every one of those States within which the deposits exist. Not only the coal, but all of their other resources and their ever-increasing wealth has always remained to yield taxes and other benefits to enrich the States and counties in which the resources are situated. But in the new States, if the resources of the public domain are to be taxed under this new and strange policy and the proceeds converted into the National Treasury, the States which are most in need of the sustenance will be thus wrongfully deprived for the benefit of the older Commonwealths, which have, and are still, reaping the full use and profit of all of their own resources.

Referring again to the subject of coal. At the present rate of consumption, by actual calculation of the Geological Survey, in the State of Colorado alone there is enough coal to supply this Nation for nine hundred years. If my State was required to pay a royalty of even 2 cents a ton on that coal she would yield more than $7,000,000,000—twice as much as all of the money of all kinds now in circulation in this country, with the entire national debt thrown in for good measure. If the royalty should be fixed, as has been suggested, at 15 cents a ton, Colorado's coal would pay more than $50,000,000,000, or nearly one-half as much as the present entire wealth of this Nation.

I can not believe that either the President or Congress will attempt to ruthlessly trample upon the inherent rights of the Western States to the profit of their own resources. If there is to be any royalty imposed upon the coal, asphaltum, or any of the rest of our resources, the proceeds should pass into the treasury of the State whose resources are being thus administered. We have no objection to the temporary withdrawal of the public domain, nor of any of these precious resources pending an expeditious passage of wise and systematic laws safeguarding their disposal; and, of course, we will cheerfully submit to the payment of all necessary expenses and for such reasonable number of federal officers as may be necessary in the due administration and disposal of those properties within our States. There should, of course, be practical and carefully prepared restrictions. There should also be, and doubtlessly will be by this Congress, a revision of the coal-land laws.

But, in brief, we insist that the policy of this Government, ever since the adoption of our Federal Constitution, has been that each State was entitled to and has always enjoyed the benefits of the natural wealth and resources and climatic conditions within its borders. We simply ask at your hands and of this administration the application of that same principle to the States of the West that has always prevailed in and been accorded to the older Commonwealths. Moreover, the legitimate and practical regulation and control and safeguarding of the resources of each State should be within the province of the state government, and whatever revenues are derived therefrom should pass into the state and county treasuries.

American citizens do not take kindly to absentee landlordism. We do not relish tyrannical interference with our local affairs. We do not like bureaucratic rule. We prefer to be governed by law and by our own people. We want the laws intelligently framed in the light of the welfare of the governed, as well as of the governing body. We do not consider an officer's proclamation of his own virtue a sufficient reason for setting aside the Constitution of the United States, or even the acts of Congress. We do not want to have to go to the Land Office and the office of the forest supervisor every morning to learn what the law is.

The inhabitants of the Alps of Switzerland, the Highlands of Scotland, and the mountainous regions of the earth have always been the most intensely patriotic and liberty-loving people, and the citizens of the West now are, and the succeeding generations will be, a perpetual exemplification of this rule. We are 2,000 miles away, but we are your younger brothers still. Do not impose upon us because you have the power to do so. Let us develop our own resources, and we will soon become a storehouse of wealth to this Nation.

I firmly believe there is not a State in this Union that has one half the variety or aggregate amount of natural resources that is within the State I have the honor to represent. Sometime I will ask a few minutes to present to this House the wealth and beauty of the Centennial State.

But for the present, and in conclusion, I will only say that we believe our climate excels that of all the other States, in proportion as we exceed them in altitude; that our soil and climate and mountain streams make our agricultural and horticultural resources the garden spot of this Nation. At this very moment the county adjoining my home is sending 25 carloads of apples to London, where they top the market of anything that has ever been known in this country, both in price and quality. Our precious metals exceed the output of any other State in the Union. As I have shown, our coal and our water power are sufficient to run an empire for a thousand years. Our oil, gas, and asphaltum, and hundreds of other resources make us the coming treasury of our country.

Colorado is the brightest jewel set in the crest of this continent, where she shines as the Kohinoor of all the gems of this Union. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Zuni National Forest, $19,741.

Mr. LEVER and Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming to the fact that we were passing over the item which carried an appropriation for the forest reserve in his State, but I see that he is up and will probably offer an amendment, and I will wait and see what it is.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 14, page 37, insert:

"Provided, That the total of the above appropriation for salaries and field and station expenses necessary for the use, maintenance, and protection of the national forests be reduced in the sum of $200,000, said reduction to be pro rata among the various items of appropriation under the above title."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment as a matter of proper procedure, without any interest in the question. Here we have read several pages of items giving specific appropriations for specific forests, and having concluded those items, and the committee having passed over them, having voted down an amendment to strike out one, and there having been no amendment offered to the items, they having been accepted by the committee, the gentleman from Wyoming now proposes to offer an amendment to amend every one of the items. I do not think it is within the province of an amendment to do that. I do not think the gentleman can recur to the original items without unanimous consent. I do not think he can offer an amendment to amend each one of these items, because that is what this amendment amounts to. Not only would it amount to that, but it would require the Clerk, or some one, to make a computation on each item to see how much should be taken out.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am endeavoring to find the $220,000 that was added to the appropriation on account of the Alaskan forest reserves, but which is not to be used for the purposes of those reserves, and which, therefore, must be distributed through these items. The items which have been read are a part of one paragraph. It is true that the chairman of the committee has not objected to amendments to the various items of appropriation, but I think he might properly have objected to these specific amendments until the entire paragraph was read.

I inquired of the chairman some time ago, and I understood him to say that he undersfood the items constituted one paragraph, and as soon as the Clerk concluded the reading of the items I offered my amendment. This is the only place in which the amendment could be offered.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, while it is clear to my mind that these are separate paragraphs within the rules of the House, still, if the gentleman had an agreement with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that he might offer his amendment after these items had all been read, I would be glad to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to offer the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not claim that I had an agreement with the chairman of the committee, or anything of the sort. I asked the chairman of the committee when I first drafted this amendment if he considered this as one paragraph, my idea being to present the amendment at the proper place, and my understanding was that he said he so considered it. This is the only way and the only time and the only place in which the House can scale down the appropriations generally.

Mr. SCOTT. Allow me to ask the gentleman: Suppose his amendment should prevail, how would the distribution be made?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know the exact sum of the items, because it does not seem to have been carried out as it seems it should have been.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman's amendment seeks to reduce each appropriation in proportion to the amount appropriated.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, if I may have a word; it strikes me that the only way in which the gentleman could, in order, have the amendment made which he proposes is by moving to recommit the bill at the proper time, under instructions to have these various items reduced. I do not believe it could be done by amendment offered at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture construe all of these separate items as one paragraph in the appropriation bill?

Mr. SCOTT. That was the way it occurred to me when the matter was first presented by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], speaking very hastily and without much consideration. I think if I had taken time to consider the matter more at length I should have held to the opinion that the provision for each forest constituted a separate paragraph, because there is a sum of money stated at the end of each paragraph. But the gentleman from Wyoming was perfectly warranted in making the statement he did.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, only for the purpose of calling to the attention of the Chair the fact that it would not be right to permit the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to settle this legal proposition, and not because I have any particular interest in the point in controversy, do I rise to say just a word upon this proposition. It seems to me that the Chair ought to bear in mind that it would be the worst kind of a precedent to establish here for the Chair to say that he would hold this to be one paragraph because the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge has that opinion. If there was an opinion held by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that this was all one paragraph, it was not called to the attention of the Committee of the Whole or to the attention of the Chair, who has the right to pass upon that question in the first instance. I would like also on that point to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that whatever may be the technical right to call each one of these a separate paragraph, or all of them together one paragraph, we have gone through all the items on the theory that they were separate paragraphs. The Chair and the entire committee have acted on that theory, and even though, technically, that were not true, it is too late now, after we have gone through all the items, to say that they should be considered as one paragraph only.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in the first place is germane to the subject, and it is offered at the place where it is proper to offer such an amendment. In the second place, it seems to the Chair that it is not in its nature legislation, nor a change of existing law. It is not for the Chair to hold that it would be difficult to administer the appropriations provided for in these several paragraphs if this amendment became a part of the law. That is a matter for the committee and for the House and not for the Chair to decide. It seems to the Chair that the amendment is in order, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, just one inquiry I wish to make of the gentleman from Wyoming. Following the paragraph to which the gentleman has offered his amendment there are items aggregating almost $700,000 under this same title. Does the gentleman intend that his amendment shall apply to the appropriations preceding or shall also include the items under this title which would follow the paragraph?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I intended, and I think that is a fair interpretation of my amendment, to have this reduction prorated upon the items preceding this proviso, and I think that is quite clear from the reading of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in all sincerity and good faith. I have no desire to cripple the Forest Service. I have no intention of attempting to reduce these appropriations below the appropriations of last year, even though I believe those appropriations more than necessary for the service properly conducted. But there has been an addition made this year, and it has been made in a bill in which all other items have been kept down, on the statement that we must keep within the estimates and, if possible, within the expenditures of last year—reduce them wherever it can be done without detriment to the public service. This increase was made on the statement by the Forest Service that as they had added 26,000,000 acres of land to the forest reserves they must have $397,000 additional for the maintenance of this additional territory.

Now, as to 12,000,000 acres of that additional territory, it is divided up among the reserves in the States generally, but 14,000,000 acres, approximately, are in Alaska. We know, therefore, by computation, that about $220,000 of the increase is, upon the statement of the Forest Service itself, for the purpose of administering the additional reserves in Alaska. And yet we find that when the service comes to make its specific appropriations for the Alaskan reserves only about $25,000 is used. In other words, the committee has granted the service $220,000, approximately, on the basis of Alaskan additions to the reserves and it will only use $25,000 in Alaska. Now, in view of these facts, it seems to me the duty of the House to reduce the appropriation by the amount which the committee added for the additional reserves in Alaska less the amount it is proposed to use in Alaska. This additional appropriation gives the service that much more to spread out over all of the reserves generally, though the Forestry Bureau has never at any time or place that I can learn declared that they needed additional sums for the general care of the reserves throughout the country.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, even if we concede that this bill carried $200,000 more for the use of the Forest Service than economical administration of that service warranted, it seems to me that the adoption of this amendment would be extremely unfortunate, because it suggests so many questions of methods. So many controversies might arise as to the meaning of the amendment and the manner in which it should be carried into effect that its adoption would create grave confusion and might be of very great disadvantage to the public service. I should like to ask the gentleman a question or two in connection with it. His amendment states that the amount appropriated for the expense and maintenance of the Forest Service should be reduced by the sum of $200,000 to be "prorated" among the various items of appropriation. My understanding of the term "prorate" is that the sum should be apportioned in accordance with the amount appropriated under each of the various items. For instance, an item in an appropriation of $100,000 would suffer twice as great a reduction as an appropriation of $50,000, and I would ask the gentleman whether he means to make the reduction in that way, in proportion to the amount provided for each forest, or does he intend to have the total amount of his reduction, $200,000, divided by the total number of forests?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my intention was to have this reduction prorated by per cent; take so much from each dollar of appropriation so it reduces the appropriation for each reserve by a certain percentage of the appropriation——

Mr. SCOTT. I think that is——

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). And if the chairman can point out any other way in which this matter can be reached, then I will be only too glad to withdraw my amendment, and it can be placed in another form by which this appropriation is reduced.

Mr. SCOTT. Inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture does not think the appropriation should be reduced, I hardly think it is up to him to endeavor to point out to the gentleman the manner in which it should be done. I think the gentleman's interpretation of his language is accurate. Now, the question is, How are we to make this reduction? If this amendment is approved and this language goes into the bill and becomes part of the law, do I understand that the clerks at the desk are to consider themselves instructed to make the mathematical calculations that are necessary to change the amounts in the bill before it is sent over to the Senate?

Mr. MONDELL. I think there will be no difficulty, Mr. Chairman, in having the calculations made, and if the House makes the reduction, the calculations are made before the bill goes to the Senate.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not familiar with the method of passing bills if he thinks there will be no trouble. This amendment, if it should prevail, will be attached to the bill and sent to the engrossing clerk, who would not have authority to dot an "i" or cross a "t."

Mr. MONDELL. If the House should reduce the appropriation by leaving it where it was last year, on the basis it was made last year—if the House is willing and anxious to do that, it can provide it by adopting this amendment, and there will be no difficulty in making the computation and having the bill arranged. Of course, that might be an excuse for voting against the amendment, but it does not affect the virtue——

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas, if he will yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to make one suggestion, and then I will yield to the gentleman. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the replies the gentleman has made to my questions have demonstrated conclusively that the method he has taken to reach the object he seeks is impracticable. If he will permit the suggestion, the proper way would have been for the gentleman himself to have taken the trouble to make the calculations, and, as we reached these items in the reading of the bill, have offered the proper amendment correcting it. I do not believe it can be done now.

Mr. SHERLEY. Without entering into any discussion as to whether this amendment is in proper form or not, or whether it will accomplish what it is intended to, I should like to know if it is true, as charged by the gentleman from Wyoming, that you have appropriated $200,000 more money than the department has heretofore needed, on the ground that the money was to be spent in Alaska, whereas in point of fact when you come to distribute the money only $25,000 goes there. That is the meat of the thing.

Mr. SCOTT. The question goes to the heart of the controversy, as the questions of the gentleman from Kentucky usually do, and leads to the statement that I had intended to make when I had questioned the gentleman from Wyoming. The committee did not understand, was not given the impression by the Chief of the Forest Service, that the additional sum estimated for in this bill was to be distributed pro rata among the new reservations that have been added to the area of the national forests. The statement was made before the committee that on account of these additional forests it would be necessary to have more money than is available for this year. When the appropriations were made for the current year they amounted for this purpose to 2.7 cents per acre. In this bill we provide an appropriation of 2.5 cents per acre. So that we have not, as a matter of fact, allowed a proportionate increase. If we had done so the amount of the increase would have been nearly twice as much as is carried in this bill. It is not the opinion of the committee, therefore, that there has been an undue allowance or that the appropriations are extravagant.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me. I am not at all familiar with the testimony as to the moneys necessary, and I am actually asking for information. If you have apportioned this money with the idea that the money was actually needed for each of these places and should be allowed, all right; but if you had a sum total arrived at on the theory that $200,000 was going to be needed in Alaska and only apply $25,000 to Alaska, I would like to know why you did not reduce the total by $175,000?

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me that the statement I have just made——

Mr. SHERLEY. It may be that I am stupid, but I confess it did not seem to me to meet the point I had in mind. Is it true that the amount estimated for these forest reserves was necessary for these forest reserves?

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly. We have reported the bill strictly in accordance with the estimate.

Mr. SHERLEY. How is it that there is this disparity between your totals? You say that the estimates were based on the necessity for $200,000 for the use of the Forest Service in Alaska and only $25,000 was given, and you did not change your totals.

Mr. SCOTT. We did not figure at any time that $200,000 was to be devoted to Alaska. I stated, and thought that that was an answer to the gentleman's question, that we did not attempt in this bill to distribute the additional appropriation and apportion it equally among the new reservations.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman will yield to me, may I make this suggestion? This estimate of the chairman as to a cost of 2.5 cents an acre, does that cover the 14,000,000 acres in Alaska?

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly the 14,000,000 acres are taken into consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But that computation would be absolutely misleading if you are not going to spend 2½ cents per acre for the care of the forests in Alaska. Is it the fact the appropriation was increased by the increased area and that, figured out at 2½ cents, will be the increase that it was necessary to give, or did you determine this according to the department need on each of the various reservations?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, this appropriation has been heretofore carried in a great big lump sum. This is the first time the bill has been reported with any degree of itemization. The committee accepted the estimates of the bureau as to the amount that will be necessary to take care of each of the forests, because the committee knew nothing about them and could not know anything except as informed by the service. The committee took the estimates of the service in making up this bill and did not inquire whether the average of 2½ cents an acre was to be expended on all of them or not. The committee simply accepted the statement of the chief of the bureau that on account of the addition of the area to the forests to this enormous extent of new reservations this much money was needed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do I understand the gentleman that he does not know whether the proper amount allotted for any given forest reserve represents 2½ cents an acre or not?

Mr. SCOTT. No; I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. You simply took what was stated as the necessary sum for that particular forest reserve?

Mr. SCOTT. That is exactly the fact. The committee had no way of finding out whether it was necessary or not; and, as a matter of fact, I presume that the amount of 2½ cents per acre is not evenly distributed, because one reserve may need 10 or 15 cents an acre, while another reserve may need very little.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It might be supposed, from some of the suggestions that have been made, that the committee in arriving at the amount that is proposed to be appropriated for this purpose, first ascertained the number of acres, second, determined by resolution the amount per acre, and then reached the total by multiplying the number of acres by 2½ cents. Is that the method the committee pursues in arriving at the amounts which should be appropriated?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly not.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that answers the whole question.

Mr. SCOTT. The committee, as I have stated, simply took the estimates of the bureau; and I think nobody believes or supposes that the proportion of 2½ cents an acre is maintained on every reserve. On a forest where a great deal of work is being done the expenditure may amount to 10 or 15 cents an acre. On another forest where nothing is being done except to protect it from depredations or from fire, the expenditure may not amount to more than 1 cent an acre. I referred only to the average, of course.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's statement is satisfactory to myself, but what may have misled some of us is the statement in the report. The report states that there is an increase of $397,500 in the Forest Service, made necessary by the addition of 26,528,439 acres, which were added after the appropriations for the fiscal year 1910 were made up.

Now, is it true that the additions to the total of the appropriation were determined by the additional amount of land to be cared for?

Mr. SCOTT. That was the only reason given us by the bureau chief who submitted the estimates.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will have the committee believe his detailed statement to mean that the estimates are the result of knowledge as to the needs of the particular reserve, then I am against this amendment; but if you have made this addition on the theory that you have got a lot more land, then the necessity for the appropriation may not follow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Especially when that land is half of it in Alaska, and they have only appropriated $25,000 for Alaska.

Mr. SCOTT. My information is that only about half the increase of 26,500,000 acres is in Alaska. Now, it may easily be true that the addition of 13,000,000 acres to the forests in the United States may involve the necessity for the addition of $397,500 to the appropriation in order that they may be properly taken care of. That may easily happen. It does not follow that because half of the land is in Alaska, half of the additional money needed to take care of it must also be sent to Alaska. The probability is that these forests in Alaska are so remote now that no use is being made of them; that it is necessary to keep only a few rangers up there in order to protect the forests from depredation or from fire, and a comparatively small amount is needed to take care of them, and yet the addition of the other 13,000,000 acres to the forests in the United States may very well call for $397,000 more than the old appropriation carried.

I trust that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. This is a very simple matter. The House appropriated for the Forest Service last year all that the service asked. It was a most liberal appropriation. This year they ask for an additional appropriation of nearly $400,000 on the ground that additional territory had been added to the reserves. We find that fourteen twenty-sixths of that additional territory is in Alaska, and therefore $220,000 is asked for that territory.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if that conclusion necessarily follows unless you have the premise that the same amount of expenditure must be given to every acre, and that premise, I understand, the gentleman from Kansas denies?

Mr. MONDELL. If you are to depart entirely from that rule, what is to prevent the Forest Service next year from adding 25,000,000 acres more in Alaska—and there is a great deal of territory up there that has as little forest on it as the territory already included—and then ask for another $400,000 and use it somewhere else, and the next year, and the next year, and the next year.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is not the point at all. The proposition is this: There is an additional number of acres there that have been brought under the supervision of the Forest Service, and by virtue of that they ask an additional amount of money. Now, the gentleman says that fourteen-twenty-sixths of that is in Alaska, and therefore, presumably, that proportion of money is for Alaska. That is a non sequitur; it does not follow at all. What I want to know is whether the gentleman's estimates are based upon information or whether he is presenting simply a mathematical problem——

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I realize that we can split hairs, and if we do not desire to reduce the appropriation we can excuse ourselves in some way; but the fact still remains that the Forest Service asked for $400,000 because they had 26,000,000 acres added to the reservations. More than one-half of that addition is in Alaska, and still they do not pretend to use but about $25,000 in Alaska.

If anybody but the Forest Service did it, I should be inclined to say that the additions in Alaska were simply an excuse to ask for additional appropriations. We know also that new additions to the national forests always call for less expenditure per acre the first year or two than after they have been for some time in the reserves.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The gentleman from Kansas says that this larger part of the appropriation is made for the service in these forest reserves which are included in the remaining twelve twenty-sixths for the additional land which has been taken in in the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. Then it should be said to the House in that event, that the 12,000,000 acres taken in in the United States require twice the amount per acre additional this year that they did for the last, and twice the amount that was asked for any other land in the national forest. We do not know, because we can not go through this bill and find out, but the same condition may exist, and in my opinion does exist, with regard to the lands added to the reserves in the United States. I am of the opinion that there are no considerable additions made to the appropriations for these particular reservations which were enlarged. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 37, between lines 14 and 15, insert "for a forestry nursery in the State of Louisiana, $1,000."

Mr. SCOTT and Mr. MANN reserved a point of order.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment at the request of the secretary of the forestry association of the State of Louisiana. They are already doing a good deal of work in the State by the use of stereopticon views, lectures, and disseminating literature, but the funds are about exhausted and they want some nursery stock. The Forest Service is willing to furnish the nursery stock if it is provided with funds to do it, and they say it will take about $1,000.

Mr. SCOTT. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that there is no law authorizing an appropriation of money for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana know of any law authorizing an appropriation of money for this purpose?

Mr. WATKINS. I understand that there has been no provision for this specific purpose in previous bills, but appropriations are made in a general way, and I understood that a portion of them have been used for a similar purpose. The appropriations are made to be distributed in various States for forestry purposes, and I understand that some of them have been utilized in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The attention of the Chair has not been called to any specific authority of law for the amendment. If it is true that the Secretary of Agriculture has heretofore in the exercise of his discretion, and out of lump sums, added reserves similar to the one suggested in this amendment, and if the Secretary has lawful authority to do that—and the Chair assumes he has—the proposed amendment would amount to a limitation upon his discretion and authority and would also be legislation. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question, I move to strike out the last word. We have now passed about 150 specific appropriations for certain forests. I understand that this is the first time that we have ever appropriated specifically, and I have no doubt that the Forest Service, in making specific estimates for these various appropriations, has not been able to determine with any degree of certainty the exact amount that will be required in each case, and that therefore there will be deficiencies in some and a surplus in others. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be advisable at this place to insert a paragraph that would give a little more flexibility during this coming fiscal year to these appropriations, and the next year when the estimates are made the department would be able to determine with more certainty the exact amount required in each case. If there is a deficiency in one and a surplus in the other, that deficiency can not be met except by a deficiency appropriation, whereas there may be a surplus in others sufficient to meet the deficiency; but there is no language in the bill that I can find that would justify the department in supplementing the deficiency in one with a surplus in the other.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, on page 61, at the bottom of the bill, there is a paragraph which reads as follows:

And not to exceed 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts for the miscellaneous expenses of the work of any bureau, division, or office herein provided for shall be available interchangeably for expenditure on the objects included within the general expenses of such bureau, division, or office, but no more than 10 per cent shall be added to any one item of appropriation except in cases of extraordinary emergency, and then only upon the written order of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now, that paragraph was inserted last year with the expectation that it would provide exactly the flexibility that the gentleman suggests to be necessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. That applies only to miscellaneous expenditures, and the specific appropriations that we have made are not miscellaneous expenditures. They are specific, and therefore that provision will not apply.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's point is well taken, and I should certainly be glad to have him suggest such an amendment.

Mr. MANN. How about the provision at the bottom of page 39? Is not that sufficient to cover it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that his rule may work both ways. It does not necessarily work in favor of economy. If there is any advantage in segregation we had better hold them to the separate items.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is the first time that this segregation has ever been made. I remember some years ago when we required the Coast and Geodetic Survey to submit specific items for the various branches of that service, and in order to avoid crippling the service in any one branch, which might result because of their not having had any experience and not being able to estimate accurately, the provision was put in there in the interest of the service.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is there any reason on earth why they should not be able to estimate exactly for these different forest reserves with the experience that they have had? If they can not do it now, they never can do it.

Mr. SCOTT. What does the gentleman from Minnesota think about the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the provision on page 39?

Mr. TAWNEY. I had not read that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and maintenance of all necessary field, office, and laboratory supplies, instruments, and equipment, $260,640.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish the gentleman from Kansas to explain what this appropriation is to be expended for.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Kansas also as to whether it is not a fact that these laboratory supplies, instruments, and equipments have been heretofore purchased out of the lump-sum appropriation made for the Forest Service, and whether it is necessary to expend every year $360,640 for laboratory equipments?

Mr. SCOTT. The purchase of these instruments has been heretofore made, as the gentleman knows, under a lump-sum appropriation.

The segregation this year was made in compliance with the request of the committee for a more complete itemization. It seems to me impractical to set out all the items in the bill, but we find in the estimates which were submitted to the committee a very detailed statement on the subject of equipment, as well as on other subjects. It covers a very large number of pages in the book which I hold in my hand.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the character of the field supplies?

Mr. SCOTT. I will read a few of these items:

Stationery and office supplies, $83,561; furniture and office equipment, $49,637; field instruments and equipment, $77,924——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Do they expect to expend $49,000 this coming year for furniture?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the estimate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is that furniture to be placed?

Mr. SCOTT. There are six or eight different headquarters in the field, besides what is maintained in Washington, and this estimate——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are they established now?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is $49,000 worth of furniture to be bought for those places which are already established?

Mr. SCOTT. It is not all office furniture; only part of it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But you said $49,000 for furniture.

Mr. SCOTT. For furniture and office equipment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is office equipment?

Mr. SCOTT. A large number of ranger cabins are built every year that are equipped with a very simple type of furniture, and they would be supplied from this item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the character of the furniture that is to be placed in a ranger's cabin?

Mr. SCOTT. They have a bed, table, two or three chairs, and a stove. I think that about covers what they have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman any idea how many rangers' cabins will be built during the coming year? Forty-nine thousand dollars may not be much to the gentleman from Kansas for the equipment of this Forest Service, but it seems so to me, particularly when it must be apparent that all of the headquarters are completely fitted up, that most of this equipment would be for the simple furniture that is to be placed in the rangers' cabins. I am inclined to think perhaps there is something in the suggestion there may be extravagance in the manner in which this service is maintained.

Mr. SCOTT. In response to an inquiry addressed to the chief of bureau in regard to this paragraph, he replied:

You will find all the details of this expenditure on schedule 152 of the Estimate Book—

That is the schedule from which I have just read—

This schedule includes a forecast of the actual material to be purchased, but that forecast does not mean we shall have purchased exactly those things. It is impossible for us to foresee so far in advance exactly what quantity of each article may be needed, and that is our best guess on the basis of previous use.

So the committee had to accept their best guess.

Mr. MANN. What page is that?

Mr. SCOTT. I read several of the items under the head of "Stationery and office supplies."

Mr. MANN. Can you give us some of the specific items?

Mr. SCOTT. Here are some of the items under the head of "Stationery and office supplies:" "Rubber bands, assorted in gross boxes, 6,000, at 25 cents, $1,500; baskets, wire, desk, 800, at 12 cents, $96; baskets, willow, waste, 100, at 45 cents, $45; binders, assorted sizes, 200, at 50 cents, $100."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are 100 wastebaskets required for these forest reserves?

Mr. MANN. They would last about fifteen minutes in the House of Representatives and not as long as that in the Navy Department.

Mr. SCOTT. There are 150 forests and——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Do they have to have a wastebasket in every forest?

Mr. SCOTT. They probably have several in the office connected with each forest.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman give us the aggregate of field supplies, office supplies, and laboratory supplies?

Mr. SCOTT. The schedules are arranged in this fashion: First, purchase of supplies and equipment, and that includes furniture and office supplies and equipment. Then there appears under that head stationery and office supplies, which covers several pages. Then there appears another heading of paper, another heading of pencils, and another heading——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there an item for press clippings?

Mr. SCOTT. Not under this paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under what paragraph is that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Page 39.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think they have provided for press clippings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure they have not. I have found that the Interior Department spent out of one appropriation about $65 for press clippings.

Mr. MANN. Only $65?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Only $65.

Mr. SCOTT. I have been referring to schedules which cover 40 or 50 pages of items; the gentleman does not expect me to read them all?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, I do not, Mr. Chairman. I assume there must be established now a number of these headquarters, and they must be equipped with furniture. I have no knowledge particularly of the character of supplies and instruments; but what I wish to inquire is, if the gentleman is able to inform me of the general items under which the $260,000 has been spent? There have been enumerated wastebaskets and furniture.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it not true that the appropriation bills making provision for the Interior Department and the Treasury, the Navy and the Army, all carry some provision for office supplies and furniture, wastebaskets, and things of that sort?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that on those bills that I help prepare the men who come before the committee are compelled to specify in detail the whole of the things that are to be used.

Mr. SCOTT. I will venture to say that there is a greater detail of specification made in the preparation of this bill than in any of the estimates of the bills that the gentleman's committee has to do with. Can the gentleman tell us, because he has something to do with the expenses of the Interior Department, how much a gross they pay for rubber bands, and how much a dozen for lead pencils?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I could, and when the item is reached in the House, if the gentleman should ever interrogate me, I should be pleased to tell him.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall certainly take advantage of that offer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the gentleman if he knows what it costs for this press-clipping service, and whether they have any such service as that?

Mr. SCOTT. I reply to the gentleman that they have no press-clipping service. I ask that debate close on the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of methods for wood distillation and for the preservative treatment of timber, for timber testing, and for other investigations and experiments to promote economy in the use of forest products, $129,420.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. This paragraph, Mr. Chairman, is subject to a point of order, and I reserve the point of order in order that in speaking to the paragraph I may not prevent some other gentlemen from making it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming reserves the point of order to the paragraph at the bottom of page 37.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall not, however, make the point of order myself. I do not know that I am opposed to the appropriation, because I realize it is well to carry on experiments of this kind; but I have been an interested reader of the press bureau of the Forest Service for some years, and I supposed they had settled all these questions long ago. I remember reading their press bulletins two or three years ago, where they stated they had discovered a mode of preserving timber with creosote and preserving timber in various ways. It is true that people have been preserving timber by the use of creosote and by the use of copper preparations for a long time; but, nevertheless, according to one of the service bulletins they are entitled to whatever credit there may be in the discovery. In this connection I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if I understood him to say that the Forest Service had no press bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from New York asked if they had a press-clipping bureau, and I told him to the best of my knowledge they had not.

Mr. MONDELL. Maybe I am mistaken in my understanding of it, but I have understood that the Forest Service sends out multiplied tens and hundreds of thousands and millions of bulletins and leaflets, and that when it sends material to the newspapers it also sends with them a franked envelope, with which the newspaper to which the material is sent is expected to return clippings to the bureau.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand that is the practice.

Mr. MONDELL. I have understood that was the practice; I have heard some complaint among newspaper men in my State, not that it was an unlawful thing to do, but their complaint was that they did not care to print as many of these self-laudatory bulletins of the Forest Service as their competitors did, and therefore they were not able to send in as many clippings to the bureau; and their idea was that therefore they were not getting as many advertisements from the bureau. Probably that was not the reason for their not being patronized. Probably that was simply an assumption.

Mr. SCOTT. Of course that assumption was entirely gratuitous.

Mr. MONDELL. I recognize that possibly it was.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me for just a moment, I should like to make a plain statement in regard to what he refers to as the "press bureau" of the department. He has been speaking of it as if it were a large part of the activities of the department, sending out "thousands and millions of self-laudatory bulletins" throughout the country. The simple truth is that just one man does practically all the editorial work to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MONDELL. He is a daisy. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. A little man from Kansas. I receive every bulletin that is sent out from the department.

Mr. MONDELL. So do I part of the time.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman says he also receives each of them. Now, I will ask him if he has ever received more than one or two in a day?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I should say not.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, how many days are there in the year?

Mr. MONDELL. I was going to talk about that. They have a mailing list of 750,000 three hundred and sixty-five days in the year—one a day—with three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, and a mailing list of 750,000; the gentleman is a good mathematician, and he can tell us how much that amounts to. [Laughter.] I received these bulletins for only a month or so last summer. At one time they made a pile on my desk, as I recollect, some 3 or 4 inches through, well weighted down.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, then, say there were two a day. The gentleman does not claim that by the multiplication of the publication in innumerable papers the bureau is responsible for sending out a million different bulletins.

Mr. MONDELL. Still they do count up. What I have said is in condemnation of extravagance. I do not want to do the Forest Service any injustice. One does not need to exaggerate matters in regard to their press bureau. There is no necessity to do that. They used last year $87,000 of the people's money for the purpose of informing the people of the wonderful work that they were doing. That is the sum, is it not?

Mr. SCOTT. That statement does not do the bureau justice.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I object to that, when they only spent $35,000 to protect many millions of acres from forest fires.

Mr. SCOTT. And if the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] could have had his way they would not have spent that much for that purpose.

I submit to the gentleman that the bulletins sent out by the Forest Service are not self-laudatory. It is only on the rarest occasions that even the name of the Forest Service appears in them. I watch them with particular care and, I think, with a critical eye, and in the last year I have seen only two of these bulletins that I should feel inclined to criticise; and they, not on account of any laudatory references to the Forest Service, but because, in my judgment, they were, in effect, an argument in favor of the purchase of large tracts of land for forest purposes, and I do not think it is the function of the bureau to enter upon an argument in favor of any policy.

Mr. MONDELL. They were in favor of the Appalachian and White Mountain forest reserves.

Mr. SCOTT. There were two of them that, I think, would bear such a construction; but for the most part, by all odds the greater number of these bulletins contain valuable information. If they do not contain valuable information, why is it that the newspapers all over the country have printed them so universally that they have attained a circulation of over 9,000,000 in the course of a single year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman stated that he has seen only two bulletins that he would be inclined to criticise, and they were in favor of a proposition to which he was opposed. Now, other gentlemen may feel inclined to criticise bulletins advocating policies in connection with the National Government to which they are opposed. If everybody who is opposed to the different things should criticise the bulletins issued on the other side of a particular subject, naturally there would be widespread condemnation of this press-bureau service.

Mr. SCOTT. If I had been in favor of the proposition that the bureau was advocating, I should still have been against the publication of those two bulletins to which I refer, because I do not think it is the function of the bureau to advocate a particular governmental policy. With that exception, all the bulletins I have read have been filled with information which is of value to the people of the country.

Mr. LAMB. May not the two bulletins to which the gentleman refers contain information that may be valuable to a great many people in this country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was about to suggest that a bulletin advocating the acquisition of the Appalachian reserve might contain information which would be of interest to a large number of people.

Mr. SCOTT. And yet the purpose of it was to advocate a governmental policy, which I do not think any bureau can properly do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are a number of other bulletins issued which are open to the same criticism.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know of any others. I simply state that I have not seen any other that in my judgment offended in that particular. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that we may proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming make the point of order?

Mr. MONDELL. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For silvicultural and other experiments and investigations independently or in cooperation with other branches of the Federal Government, with States, and with individuals, to determine the best methods for the conservative management of forests and forest lands, $108,010.

Mr. SCOTT. In order to correct an error in the estimates, I submit an amendment to the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, line 9, after the word "silvicultural," insert the word "dendrological."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For dendrological, market, and other miscellaneous forest investigations and experiments, and for collating, digesting, recording, illustrating, and distributing the results of the experiments and investigations herein provided for, $115,470.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, in line 15, strike out the word "dendrological."

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the adoption of this amendment, in connection with the one which has just been adopted, will be simply to transfer the word "dendrological" from line 15 to line 9. It was a mistake that was made in the bureau in making up the estimates. Then it will read, in line 9—

For silvicultural, dendrological, and other experiments—

And so forth.

And in line 15 it will read—

For market and other miscellaneous forest investigations and experiments.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I addressed the Chair before, but waited until the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas was disposed of. I now rise and move to strike out the last word, because I confess I am greatly confused, although I have no doubt the gentleman from Kansas will remove my confusion, in regard to these appropriations. Here are three large appropriations, one of $66,000 for investigations within the national forests necessary for tree planting, for the reproduction of existing forests, and the regulation of cutting; another for experiments and investigations to determine the best methods for the conservative management of forests and forest lands, $108,000; another for collating, digesting, recording, illustrating, and distributing the results of the experiments and investigations, $115,000.

Now, can the gentleman explain to the committee or give some information of what this work is to one who is ignorant of it? The appropriations seem large and suggest the probability of duplicate work. Here is an appropriation of $108,000 to determine the best methods for the conservative management of forests and forest lands, which would seem to be, presumably, office work.

Mr. SCOTT. A great deal of work provided for under that paragraph is field work. The bureau says:

The studies are intended to gather scientific data for practical use in forest management. Small areas are marked off and counts, measurements, and descriptions carefully made. Subsequent counts, measurements, and descriptions register the changes which take place.

Mr. PERKINS. For how many years has this appropriation been made?

Mr. SCOTT. This class of work has been appropriated for ever since the Forest Service was organized.

Mr. PERKINS. When was that?

Mr. SCOTT. The Forest Service was organized early in the nineties.

Mr. PERKINS. And this is permanent work?

Mr. SCOTT. This is permanent work.

Mr. PERKINS. And never ends?

Mr. SCOTT. And never will end, because it is hoped that new results will be obtained every year. Let me read further:

Sometimes these areas are on recent cuttings, sometimes on planted areas, sometimes in thinnings, sometimes on burns, sometimes in natural forests of different positions and degrees of density. In this way knowledge is gained of the kind and amount of reproduction which takes place, the kinds of trees and methods of planting them best suited to the locality, the rate of growth, and the laws of forest life. In the light of this knowledge the forester knows how to handle the forest so as to obtain the best results.

Some of these studies can best be conducted at forest experiment stations. Two of these stations, one in Arizona and one in Colorado, have been established in the past two years and have already furnished valuable scientific information of great use in tree planting and in handling the cutting of timber. The work of these stations for forestry is comparable to that done for agriculture by the agricultural experiment stations.

Mr. PERKINS. How is it in the European countries? Do they carry out work of this sort and make appropriations of this kind proportionately for the care and preservation of the forests?

Mr. SCOTT. I never have inquired; but I know in European forests many dollars and much care is spent in forestry work, and where we spend 2 or 3 cents they spend dollars. The statement I have read, which I think will convey to the membership of the House the best idea of the work done under this paragraph, is that in which it is compared with the work done in the agricultural experiment stations in the promotion of agriculture as this is in the promotion of forestry.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, line 11, strike out the words "with individuals."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of eliciting some information. My recollection is that in the past some sort of contracts were made between the Forest Service and certain eminent college professors by which they were to render in their leisure moments some service of some kind—I never knew exactly what—in the prosecution of this work. Great complaint had arisen as to the peculiar relations which existed between the men thus employed and the service. Many men who have more information on the subject than I had were under the impression that in many instances the most important service rendered was in the preparation of special articles advertising the Forest Service and affecting public sentiment favorable to it.

I am not sufficiently well informed as to what has been done to state whether these contentions are correct. It seems to me that the Forest Service has, as all other departments of the Government should have, if properly and regularly organized, all the men who might be essential to its efficient and proper conduct. It is a vicious practice to have retainers, men in the various educational institutions throughout the country, who would be somewhat prejudiced in favor of the service because they were receiving from the appropriation some addition to the compensation that they receive in their regular employment, and who devote some of their time to the preparation of special papers for publication in various magazines and other periodicals, all of them colored in the interest of that particular bureau.

It seems to me, if that practice exists, it is much more vicious than the other practice of maintaining a press agent in the bureau for the purpose of giving out information; because then it is well known that the information is being prepared under the direction of the bureau and for the purpose of exploiting its work. This other method of obtaining favorable comment and laudatory articles in the various periodicals of the country is so adroitly concealed and so effective in deceiving the public that it seems to me it should not be tolerated. If my surmise be correct that these words in this paragraph permit and encourage that practice, I hope, then, that this amendment will prevail. I have offered it for the purpose of obtaining from the chairman the information, and if my information be correct, I shall press the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the words which the gentleman from New York moves to strike out do not relate in any way to the practice which he criticises. There is very little cooperation of the character to which he has reference between the Forest Service and educational institutions or members of the faculties of those institutions. The University of Wisconsin has recently erected a $50,000 building and equipped it at great expense for the purpose of carrying on timber-testing experiments. The Forest Service is cooperating with them in that work, and is cooperating in a similar way, I believe, with two or three other institutions. But the cooperation referred to in this paragraph is cooperation with other federal departments, with States, and with individuals looking to more economical and scientific management of privately or state owned forests. For illustration, I read a brief statement submitted at my request in explanation of this work:

Private cooperation carried on with private owners works along essentially the same lines and for the same ends as have already been described under federal cooperation, except that no supervision of cutting or planting is given by the service. An important part of the private cooperative work is advice to farm woodlot owners whose holdings, though great in the aggregate, are too small to justify the employment of a private forester. Such advice is educational, since it tends to widely diffuse a knowledge of practical forestry.

In the hearings before the committee, in response to a question directed to this matter, the Forester said:

We have made in the last year about 90 plans for private owners, who pay the expense of them in the main, covering about 700,000 acres. * * * The total number of such plans to date is 770, comprising an area of about 11,000,000 acres.

The only expense which the preparation of those plans involves to the department is the salary of a man in charge of the work, and we believe it is a very important and entirely proper function of the bureau.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's explanation discloses that this is not the particular paragraph that is responsible for the abuse of which I complain, and I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For dendrological, market, and other miscellaneous forest investigations and experiments, and for collating, digesting, recording, illustrating, and distributing the results of the experiments and investigations herein provided for, $115,470.

The CHAIRMAN. At this point the gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 15, strike out the word "dendrological;" and, in line 16, strike out the words "and experiments."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, after line 14, insert:

"Paper test: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test such plants and woods as may require tests to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, $14,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point some memoranda furnished to me by the department in relation to ground-wood experiments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert certain papers in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The papers referred to are as follows:

Ground-wood experiments in cooperation with the American Paper and Pulp Association.

THE PROBLEM.

It is proposed that the Forest Service and the American Paper and Pulp Association cooperate in an experimental study of the following problem:

Is it possible to produce commercially a grade of ground wood from species other than spruce suitable for the production of news, wrapping, and other cheaper grades of paper, and under what conditions?

SCOPE OF WORK.

The commercial feasibility of utilizing any species of wood for the manufacture of ground wood is in main dependent upon the quality of pulp produced and the cost of production. These in turn are chiefly dependent upon such fundamental manufacturing conditions as surface of stone, peripheral speed of stone, pressure on grinder, temperature of grinting, moisture, condition of wood, etc.

Briefly, the work will be an experimental study of the relation of these factors to the quality of pulp reduced and the cost of production.

The scope of the work should be limited to a study of the first three conditions mentioned above. One condition at a time should be verified, and complete records of quality of pulp, rate of production, power consumption per ton, and losses should be made for each run.

METHODS OF ATTACK.

There are two general plans of attack that may be followed in investigating this problem:

PLAN I.

To conduct the experiments with commercial equipment and under conditions ordinarily encountered in commercial practice.

PLAN II.

First, to conduct the experiments by means of equipment of a semi-commercial character adapted to laboratory work and, second, to verify on a commercial scale the most promising results secured.

PRELIMINARY STEPS.

PLAN I.

Before work can be undertaken under Plan I the following steps must be taken:

a. The rental of a building in Appleton, Wis., or some other pulp-manufacturing center near Madison, Wis. Approximately 3,000 square feet of floor space is required.

b. The rental of covered and open space for storing materials, which will require 6,000 square feet of the former and 1,600 square feet of the latter, will be required.

c. The securing and installation of a working unit of a ground-wood mill, consisting of the following equipment:

One 40-inch saw; one 5-foot barker; one Standard splitter; one 40-horsepower motor for above; one Standard grinder, 3 pockets; one Standard wet machine, 84 inches; one Standard diaphragm screen, 12 plates; one 500-horsepower motor; and one 50-horsepower motor.

Minor electrical equipment for accurate record of power consumption and grinder control.

Miscellaneous equipment, such as scales, pumps, shafting, gauges, valves, etc.

d. The employment of the following labor:

One skilled observer in charge, who shall be held responsible for carrying out the working plan.

Two laborers, more or less familiar with pulp-mill operation, to assist the man in charge.

PLAN II.

Before undertaking work under Plan II the following preliminary steps must be made:

a. Securing and installing in the Forest Products Laboratory at Madison the following equipment:

One modified commercial grinder, 1 pocket, size of stone 54 to 56 inches diameter by 12 inches face.

One 75-horsepower motor.

Minor electrical equipment for accurate record of power consumption and grinder control.

Miscellaneous equipment, such as pumps, valves, gauges, etc.

b. The employment of the following laborers:

One skilled observer in charge, who shall be held responsible for carrying out the working plan.

One assistant.

APPROXIMATE COST ESTIMATES.

PLAN I.

Equipment and installation.

*Equipment	$18,000
*Installation of equipment	2,000
Total	20,000

Operating cost per annum.

Rent of building and ground (including light, heat, water, telephone)	$2,550
Electric power	5,400
*Cost of wood, 100 cords, 3 different species, at $12 per cord	1,200
(This estimate includes freight charges, hauling, and other expenses chargeable to the transportation and delivery of the wood to the experimental apparatus.)
Salaries	3,000
Miscellaneous expenses (including repairs, modification of equipment, etc.)	1,500
Contingent	500
Total	14,150

PLAN II.

Equipment and installation.

*Equipment	$3,500
*Installation of equipment	1,000
Total	4,500

Operating cost per annum.

Electric power	$1,500
*Cost of wood, 18 cords, 3 different species, at $15 per cord	270
(Estimate includes freight charges, hauling, and other expenses chargeable to the transportation and delivery of the wood to the experimental apparatus.)
Salaries	3,000
Miscellaneous expenses (including repairs, modifications, etc.)	1,000
Contingent	500
Total	6,270

SHARING EXPENSE.

It is proposed that the American Paper and Pulp Association will provide items and bear expenses as indicated by asterisks.

Under this arrangement the cost of the experiments will be divided as follows:

PLAN I.

Cost to the association.

For equipment and installation	$20,000
Operating expenses per annum	1,200

Cost to Forest Service.

Operating expenses per annum	$14,100

PLAN II.

Cost to the association.

For equipment and installation	$4,500
Operating expenses per annum	270

Cost to Forest Service.

Operating expenses per annum	6,000

LENGTH OF TIME.

PLAN I.

Assuming the species to be studied are hemlock, jack pine, and balsam, the total time required for the work should not exceed two years after installation is made.

PLAN II.

In order to obtain the same results as in Plan I, the amount of time required should be the same for the two plans, namely, not to exceed two years. In case, however, the number of fundamental conditions studied is increased, or experimental work of a radically different nature is undertaken, the length of time will be increased.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. MALBY) having assumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the agricultural appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following concurrent resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 22.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Gen. Lewis Wallace, presented by the State of Indiana, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Indiana.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure suitable copper-process plates, to be bound with these proceedings—to the Committee on Printing.

SPECIAL MESSENGER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication:

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I hereby resign my position as special messenger of the House of Representatives, to take effect February 1, 1910.

Respectfully,

JOSIAH H. SHINN.

JANUARY 20, 1910.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the communication will lie upon the table.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia offers a privileged resolution (H. Res. 364), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of House resolution 362:

"Resolved, That J. J. Speight is hereby appointed as successor to the person named in the resolution adopted by the House January 28, 1909, as special messenger, as provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 4, 1909, to take effect on and after February 1, 1910."

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

PRICES AND WAGES.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 163), which was read and referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate resolution 163.

Resolved, That there shall be appointed by the President of the Senate a select committee of five Senators to investigate the cost of living and the prices of the necessaries of life; to ascertain, so far as possible, whether such prices have increased during the past ten years, and the cause or causes of such increase; said committee shall also investigate the subject of wages and ascertain whether wages have increased during the same period; said committee shall also investigate the cost of production of said articles and of their distribution and sale; and shall report to Congress the results of their investigations, together with any recommendations, and with a bill or bills if, in the judgment of the committee, legislation is necessary in regard to the subjects of the investigation.

Said committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to employ experts, administer oaths, take testimony, send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer to report hearings, and have such hearings printed. And all necessary expenses to carry out the provisions of this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

PROTECTION AND PRESERVATION OF FOOD FISHES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 638), which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HALE, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State submitting "a system of uniform and common international regulations for the protection and preservation of the food fishes in international boundary waters of the United States and Canada," which have been "prepared by the International Fisheries Commission pursuant to and under the authority of the convention of April 11, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain."

The regulations are submitted to the Congress in order that due legislative action on the part of the Government of the United States may be taken, as stipulated for in article 3 of the convention.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 2, 1910.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18282, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 18282) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1910, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee may be considered as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 2, after line 13, to strike out "To meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates of the United States to the Fourth International Conference of American States to be held at the city of Buenos Aires, beginning on the 9th day of July, 1910, and of their salaried clerical assistants, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1910, $50,000," and to insert "To meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates of the United States to the Fourth International Conference of American States to be held at the city of Buenos Aires, beginning on the 9th day of July, 1910, and of their clerical assistants, $100,000, to continue available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State, who is hereby authorized to direct the outgoing and return of the delegates and their clerical assistants in such manner and by such route as he may deem proper."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 7, to insert:

International Conference on Maritime Law: For expenses necessary for the representation of the United States at the adjourned meeting of the Third International Conference on Maritime Law, at Brussels, Belgium, in April, 1910, for the purpose of considering conventions and projects relating to collisions at sea, salvage, liability of shipowners, and liens, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, together with the unexpended balance of the previous appropriation for representation of the United States at the Third International Conference on Maritime Law, to meet at Brussels in 1909.

Mr. HALE. In line 11, I move to strike out the words "in April."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 18, to insert:

St. John River Commission: To complete the work of the joint commission authorized in the diplomatic and consular act for the fiscal year 1907, to investigate and report upon the conditions and uses of the St. John River, and to make recommendations for the regulation of the use thereof by the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain, according to the provisions of treaties between the two countries, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 2, to insert:

International Agricultural Exhibition, etc., Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic: To enable the Government to participate in the International Agricultural Exhibition, and the International Exposition of Fine Arts, to be held at Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic, beginning in May, 1910, and to participate in the Exhibition of Fine and Applied Arts to be held at Santiago, Chile, beginning in September, 1910, and to provide for the compensation and expenses of commissioners thereto on the part of the United States, $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State and to continue available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 15, to insert:

Building, International Bureau of American Republics, maintenance: For maintenance of the new building of the International Bureau of American Republics until June 30, 1910, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendments were, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 4, after line 21, to strike out:

Office of the Secretary of the Treasury, Division of Loans and Currency: To continue the employment of the following during the last half of the fiscal year 1910, namely: One clerk of class 1; 7 clerks and counters, at the rate of $720 each per annum; and 2 laborers, at the rate of $660 each per annum; in all, $3,780.

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency: To continue the employment of the following during the last half of the fiscal year 1910, namely: Fifteen clerks of class 1; 7 counters, at the rate of $840 each per annum; and 1 assistant messenger, at the rate of $720 per annum; in all, $12,300.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the two amendments, from line 22, on page 4, to line 11, on page 5, be disagreed to, and I shall offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee which have just been read.

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. HALE. At the end of line 11, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 11, on page 5, insert:

Office of the Treasurer of the United States: To continue the employment of 1 clerk of class 1 during the last half of the fiscal year 1910, $500. And all payments heretofore made to persons employed or appointed in said Division of Loans and Currency, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, office of the Comptroller of the Currency, office of the Treasurer of the United States, and in the government paper mill at Pittsfield, Mass., occasioned by the passage of the emergency currency act, and paid from the indefinite appropriation made to enforce the same, are hereby legalized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, after line 12, to insert:

For additional amount required for washing and hemming towels, for the purchase of awnings and fixtures, window shades and fixtures, alcohol, benzine, turpentine, varnish, baskets, belting, bellows, bowls, brooms, buckets, brushes, canvas, crash, cloth, chamois skins, cotton waste, door and window fasteners, dusters; flower-garden, street, and engine hose; lace leather, lye, nails, oils, plants, picks, pitchers, powders, stencil plates, hand stamps and repairs of same, stamp ink, spittoons, soap, matches, match safes, sponges, tacks, traps, thermometers, toilet paper, tools, towels, towel racks, tumblers, wire, zinc, and for blacksmithing, repairs of machinery, removal of rubbish, sharpening tools, advertising for proposals, and for sales at public auction in Washington, D. C., of condemned property belonging to the Treasury Department, payment of auctioneer fees; and purchase of other absolutely necessary articles, $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 15, to insert:

Distinctive paper for United States securities: For the following additional employees during the fiscal year 1910, namely, assistant register, at the rate of $1,050 per annum; counter, at the rate of $720 per annum; and laborer, at the rate of $660 per annum; in all, $1,215, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 12, to insert:

That the sum of $980, heretofore appropriated to be paid to David Stewart, administrator of Paul Bentalou, in the act entitled "An act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. L., p. 1201); that the sum of $490, heretofore appropriated to be paid to David Stewart administrator de bonis non, cum testamento annexo of estate of Paul Bentalou, in the act entitled "An act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes," approved May 27, 1902 (32 Stat. L., p. 226); and the sum of $1,241.17, heretofore appropriated to be paid to David Stewart, administrator of Paul Bentalou, in the act entitled "An act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1905 (33 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 786), being in the aggregate the sum of $2,711.17, be now paid to Leigh Bonsal, administrator of Eloise Bentalou Sanger Michard: Provided, That the same shall not be paid until the Court of Claims shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that said Leigh Bonsal as administrator represents the next of kin of said Eloise Bentalou Sanger Michard, and the court which granted the administration shall certify that said Leigh Bonsal, as administrator of said Eloise Bentalou Sanger Michard, has given adequate security for the legal disbursement of the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have no doubt that it is all correct, but I would be very glad if the Senator would give us some reason why the amendment is introduced in this bill.

Mr. HALE. The amendment follows the practice in such cases. It is no appropriation of money, but provides that the previous appropriation shall be paid now to the actual parties in interest. That is all there is in the amendment. It is not a new matter at all.

Mr. BACON. I simply desired to know whether provisions of this kind are usually found in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Yes; provisions of this kind, simply sending previous appropriations to heirs and administrators, are always put upon deficiency appropriation bills.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public buildings," on page 12, after line 23, to insert:

Ansonia, Conn., post-office: The provision in section 35 of the public-building act approved May 30, 1908, requiring sites to be bounded upon at least two sides by streets, shall not apply to the public building at Ansonia, Conn., but the limit of cost of site and building shall not thereby be increased.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 18, to insert:

Danville, Va.: Rent of buildings and moving expenses incident thereto, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 20, to insert:

Fremont, Nebr.: Rent of buildings and moving expenses incident thereto, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 24, to insert:

Jackson, Tenn.: Rent of buildings and moving expenses incident thereto, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 14, to insert:

Kansas City, Kans., post-office, etc.: For rent of buildings and moving expenses incident thereto, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 3, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 24, to insert:

Santa Rosa, Cal., post-office: For constructing a drain, with proper outlet, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 11, on page 15.

Mr. HALE. After line 11, on page 15, I move to insert:

Indianapolis, Ind., court-house and post-office: To pay Rankin & Kellogg the amount found due them as commissions for services performed under the provisions of the act approved February 20, 1893, as architects in charge of the construction of the court-house and post-office building, Indianapolis, Ind., $1,144.86.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 8, on page 16.

Mr. HALE. On page 16, after line 8, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 8 it is proposed to insert:

Relief of Henry D. Dillon: The accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby directed to allow as a charge against the respective appropriations as rendered, all vouchers and railroads accounts covering expenses incurred by Henry D. Dillon, an assistant inspector of furniture, including also his salary as such inspector while traveling under instructions from the department and engaged in the work of inspecting furniture for public buildings for the time between April 26, 1909, and September 6, 1909, and for this purpose such settlements as have heretofore been made shall be reopened and readjusted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "District of Columbia," on page 16, after line 22, to insert:

For printing the annual reports of the superintendent of insurance for the years 1907 and 1908, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HALE. In line 23, after the word "printing," I move to insert the words "and binding."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 3, after the word "ninety-six," to insert "and Senate Document No. 326;" and in line 5, after the word "session," to strike out "$2,964.71" and insert "$3,269.01," so as to make the clause read:

Judgments: For payment of the judgments, including costs, against the District of Columbia, set forth in House Document No. 496 and Senate Document No. 326, of this session, $3,269.01, together with a further sum sufficient to pay the interest, at not exceeding 4 per cent, on said judgments, as provided by law, from the date the same became due until the date of payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Military establishment," on page 20, after line 11, to insert:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Reimbursement Canadian department of public works: To authorize the officer in charge of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system to reimburse the Canadian department of public works from receipts of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system on account of telegraphic transfer business with the Dominion government telegraph system at International Boundary, Alaska, $82.39.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Subsistence department," on page 20, line 24, after the word "ten," to strike out "including cost of actual subsistence of military convicts;" and on page 21, line 1, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That no part of the last foregoing appropriation carried in this act for subsistence of the army, including all objects mentioned under that head, shall be expended in payment for more than actual subsistence to military convicts serving sentence in the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and in like prisons and in their several branches.

So as to make the clause read:

For subsistence of the army, including all objects mentioned under this head in the army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1910, $1,250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quartermaster's Department," on page 21, after line 22, to insert:

Shiloh National Military Park: For replacing property owned by the Government in the Shiloh National Military Park, destroyed by the cyclone of October 14, 1909, and removing débris from the park, including about 10,000 fallen trees, $34,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Naval establishment," on page 25, after line 11, to insert:

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Heating and lighting, Naval Academy: Fuel, oil, waste, and other materials for the operation, repair, and maintenance of the plant; heating and lighting apparatus and tools; and for heating and lighting the academy and band men's quarters, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of the Interior," on page 26, after line 2, to insert:

Completion of filing system, Interior Department: For continuing and completing the installation of the vertical system of filing in the General Land Office and the Office of Indian Affairs, $9,500, to be immediately available and remain available until used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 7, to insert:

For the Capitol: For additional amount for repairs, improvements, and equipment to the Senate kitchens and restaurants in the Capitol building, including personal and other services, to be expended by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, $37,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 25, before the word "for," to strike out "Capitol building," so as to make the clause read:

For work at Capitol and for general repairs thereof, including flags for the east and west fronts of the center of the Capitol; flagstaffs, halyards, and tackle, wages of mechanics and laborers; purchase, maintenance, and driving of office vehicle, $13,541.05.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 20, to insert:

The salary of the Assistant Attorney-General authorized in said act is hereby fixed at the rate of $8,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty," so as to make the clause read:

In all for United States court of customs appeals, $71,440, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Commerce and Labor," on page 35, after line 2, to insert:

Immigration Commission: For the expenses of the commission provided for in section 39 of the act of February 20, 1907, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," $125,000, to be available until December 5, 1910: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for field work, nor shall any member of said commission be entitled to or receive any salary as such member after March 1, 1910. And the said commission shall complete its entire work and make its final report and the commission shall cease on the first Monday of December, 1910.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I see that that provision which is inserted as an amendment in the pending bill appears in the bill as presented to the House of Representatives, where it went out on a point of order. I do not see why the same point of order made in the other House would not be well taken in the Senate, based on the ground that it is an appropriation made, for which there is no authority in existing law. I am disposed, at all events, at this time to raise that point of order against the provision just read.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the point of order made in the other House against this provision as it was reported by the House Committee on Appropriations was under the House rule that it was changing existing law, which was unquestionably obnoxious to the House rule. Our rule is as to general legislation. I do not think this is general legislation. It is a mere continuance to supply a deficiency of work which was authorized by previous legislation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I make this single observation, that it is rather a splitting of hairs to say that there is a difference between enacting legislation in a given case, and making an appropriation in a given case, where there is no provision of law authorizing it or to meet any demand of existing law, and to say that this is not general legislation. If there is no law on the subject, if there is no legal demand, no legal authority for the appropriation, then it is new legislation and, in substance and effect, is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri make the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. STONE. I did make it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that there is proper ground for a difference of opinion as to the correct construction of the rule on this particular amendment, and exercising his right under Rule XX the Chair will submit the matter to the Senate. Senators who are of opinion that the amendment is in order will say "aye," those opposed will say "no." The "ayes" have it, and the amendment is declared to be in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, not for the purpose of taking any issue whatever with the general propriety of this amendment, I should really like to have some statement as to how this money is to be spent, simply in a general way. Of course we can not go into all the details.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, in order to make the matter perfectly clear, I may perhaps refer to the action of a year ago. When the commission was organized it was authorized to make a very full and thorough investigation, and the payment of the expenses of the commission was to be made from what was known as the "immigrant fund." A year or more ago the immigrant fund was abolished. It then became necessary for the expenses of the commission to come under the supervision of the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses. When this was done—it was just about a year ago this time—the bill as presented by the committee of the House of Representatives contained an appropriation of $300,000 to complete the work of the commission. That went out on a point of order. An amendment was offered in the Senate, based upon an estimate of the commission of the amount of work that would be required to make the necessary tabulations and to edit the reports, at $250,000, which was adopted. The bill went back to the House when the amendment was disagreed to, but from the committee of conference there was reported a modification of the amendment appropriating $150,000, with a stipulation that the work should be completed by the 4th day of March next.

The commission have been diligent during the last year and have turned out a large amount of work. In addition to the reports already presented to Congress they have many others almost ready for presentation. On the other hand, they have a vast amount of material which has been gathered by the field force, about 50 per cent of which has been tabulated, but which will be entirely worthless unless a further appropriation is made for completing the tabulation and preparing the reports based upon the same. The commission, therefore, ask for this appropriation.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, it is right there that I desire information.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. What is the character of the information which has to be tabulated? I do not ask the Senator to go into details, but to state it only in a general way.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not know that I quite understood the Senator's question.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Vermont said that the commission had been actively engaged and had secured a large amount of information, which was to be tabulated and then incorporated in a report.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I simply desired, not going into detail and not unnecessarily to burden the Senator, but in a general way, a statement as to the character of that information.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think I can briefly answer the question of the Senator from Georgia. We have already submitted reports to Congress on the white-slave traffic; on steerage conditions; on physical assimilation of the immigrant; on congestion in the large cities of the country; and also upon the occupations of immigrants and their children. Those reports are all in. We have reports in process of preparation, which will probably be completed before the 4th of March, upon several other subjects—the immigrant in agriculture, the relative fecundity of immigrants and their children, the investigations in Europe, and the medical examination abroad. We have a report on the immigrant aid societies that will probably be presented this week; another on alien criminality, of great interest and great value; and a very exhaustive report on the immigration situation in Canada, which, in contrast to ours, is not only interesting, but very important. We have also a dictionary of the immigrant races, a very complete volume for reference; the history of European immigration in the United States, covering the whole period and written in popular form; a review of the immigration legislation of the country from the beginning, and legislation regulating the carriage of passengers at sea. That is a subject which we have already acted upon in a bill passed last winter. Another report will be presented on immigrants' banks.

The unfinished work to which the Senator refers covers some of the large industries of the country. When it is prepared and presented it will give a picture, I think, representing almost the exact status of the immigration of the last twenty or thirty years, which is of a class entirely different, new, and distinct from the immigration which came to this country prior to 1887. I have in my hand a chart, which perhaps the Senator can see from his place [exhibiting]. The dark portion of that chart represents the immigration from 1882 to 1909 of those coming from northern and western Europe, England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and the western part of Europe, and the lighter portion of the chart shows how the immigration from southern and eastern Europe has been constantly increasing. I think I have here the statistics that will show what that change has been and how vitally it affects us as a Nation.

Down to 1882 the immigration from northern and western Europe—that is to say, from Great Britain, Ireland, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Belgium, Spain, and Portugal—constituted 87 per cent of the entire immigration into the United States, while the immigration from southern and eastern Europe—that is to say, from Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Greece, Turkey, and the Balkan States—was only 13 per cent of the total. Twenty-five years later, in 1907, that from northern and western Europe had decreased from 87 to 20 per cent of the whole, while that from southern and western Europe had increased from 13 per cent to 80 per cent of all coming into the country.

Presented in another form, from 1820 to 1882, inclusive, a period of sixty-two years, 9,538,000 persons, or 96 per cent of the whole immigration of the country, came from northern and western Europe, while from 1883 to 1909, a period of only twenty-six years, we received 8,192,000 persons, only about a million less than we received in the previous period of sixty-two years, and of this number nearly 57 per cent came from southern and eastern Europe. This was a vast influx, as will be seen, of new and of untried races.

With the increase in the business industry of the country within the last twenty years, this current of new immigration has gone into the coal mines; it has gone into the woolen and cotton industries; it has gone into agriculture; it has gone along all the lines of industry, and has found employment. The commission has been making a very exhaustive study in more than one hundred selected localities to show what effect the coming of those immigrants has had upon the community and upon the individual American, and, on the other hand, what effect the American has been having on the immigrant.

We have, Mr. President, already in the process of preparation, and very nearly ready to be presented, a most exhaustive study of the bituminous coal industry in this country, and I call the Senator's attention to two or three facts that show the character of it. We find that the number of tons of bituminous coal produced in Pennsylvania in 1885—so recent a date as that—was 23,413,000, in round numbers, while in 1907 it was 149,559,000, or an increase of 539 per cent.

We have gone not only to Pennsylvania, but to other sections of the country as well, and have made a most exhaustive examination of the immigrant of the new type, who has been employed in that industry. He has been examined from every point of view; and a report which will probably make a volume of five or six hundred pages will be presented showing just precisely how he is behaving, how he is living, whether he is prospering, what influence he is exerting upon the community, and what influence the community is having upon him. In short, how and to what extent the work of assimilation is going on. It is a very exhaustive and a very valuable report. Without this appropriation no more reports of that kind can be made.

In addition to this, we have material covering the woolen industry, the cotton industry, the glass industry, the boot and shoe industry, and several other of the great industries of the country, in regard to which much study has been given, in which industries different nationalities have been employed.

This amendment, the Senator will observe, provides that no further salaries shall be paid to the commissioners, and no new field work shall be undertaken. The commission is asking for the appropriation simply that the work on the material already on hand, which is partly prepared and partly tabulated, may be completed, and that reports covering the entire field of the investigation may be prepared and presented to Congress by the 1st of December next.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Vermont omitted, I think, to mention one great collection of statistics and figures which will simply be wasted and thrown away unless this additional appropriation is made. The matter to which I refer relates to the Asiatic immigration on the western coast, a matter of the very greatest importance. The material has all been collected, and some $40,000 was spent in field work relating to the Chinese, the Japanese, and the Hindoos. That will simply be wasted and thrown away unless we can have an opportunity to tabulate it and put it into form. That is another of the matters that will be lost.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That work has been under the charge of Professor Millis, of Stanford University, of California, and is one of the most exhaustive investigations I have known. I said to the committee yesterday that the material covering that subject, consising of individual and family cards, containing the most vital and minute information, that was shipped from San Francisco to Washington weighed a ton. That shows something of the exhaustive character of that investigation, and I may add that it covers not only California but all the Rocky Mountain States from Idaho through to Arizona. It will bring together a mass of information in which, I think, other departments of our Government will be very much interested in the future.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am very glad to.

Mr. STONE. I have listened with pleasure to the very interesting statement of the Senator from Vermont; and I should like to ask him a question. This commission has been in existence some three years?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It was organized in the spring of 1907. Some work was done in Europe that summer, and during the next winter the scope and the extent of the inquiry were determined upon and plans for the field work adopted. It was begun on the 1st day of July, 1908, and was substantially completed on the 1st of July, 1909.

Mr. STONE. The expenses incurred by the commission under the act authorizing its creation were to be paid out of the immigration fund?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They were.

Mr. STONE. And the Senator says that that fund became exhausted, so that it became necessary——

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No. It did not become exhausted, but the fund was abolished by legislation, and the receipts from that source were turned into the general fund of the United States Treasury. So it became necessary to have appropriated by Congress whatever sums that might be necessary to complete the work.

Mr. STONE. The fund ceased to be available, at all events.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Then you had to resort to ordinary appropriations?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. STONE. What was the amount of the last appropriation?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. A hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. STONE. What has been the total amount of appropriations?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The total amount expended?

Mr. STONE. The total appropriation.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is the only appropriation which has been made.

Mr. STONE. The only one?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; at that time, as I said, the commission asked for $250,000.

Mr. STONE. That appropriation was made at the last session.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. At the last session.

Mr. STONE. Of the last Congress?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Was there a provision—I understand there was—that with that appropriation the business of the commission was to be concluded and the life and labors of the commission should cease in March, 1910.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is the fact; but Congress appropriated only $150,000, though the commission informed that body that it could not complete the work without an expenditure of $250,000. They have gone as far as they have been able to do.

Mr. STONE. What has been the total appropriation?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. From the beginning the total disbursements have been $657,992.67. Of this amount, $509,861.61 has been for the cost of collection and tabulation of material; general field work and clerical force, with 153 field agents and 310 clerks employed, all told—salaries and expenses. The cost of administration, salaries and expenses of commissioners, secretaries, statistical and headquarters force was $91,904.66; printing, supplies, and miscellaneous expenses, $35,549.89. The expenses of the commission in Europe were $20,676.51.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Vermont is through, I desire to say that it seemed to me that the commission had expended a very large sum of money and had been at work a long time, and that we had reached a point where we had better adhere to the determination arrived at when the last appropriation was made, namely, that the life and labors of the commission should cease on March 10, 1910. I remember reading some remarks made by members of this commission last year, when the appropriation bill was pending, to the effect that there was no reason why the work of the commission could not be completed and final report made by the 1st of December of last year and certainly by the 1st of January of the present year. That opinion was decisively expressed by members of the commission. There was some difference of opinion, though not radical, as to that; and finally it was determined that the appropriation should be made and the work be prosecuted and completed by March 10—I think that was the date—of the present year.

And so, when I saw that a further appropriation of $125,000 was asked for and an extension of the life of the commission for nine or ten months, I was disposed to approve the view taken by Members of the House—some of them, at least—and that we had better insist upon this work being completed in accordance with the provisions of the act of last year.

However, after having been advised as I have been by the very clear and intelligent statement made by the Senator from Vermont; after having been advised by him as to the character of the work not yet completed and of its importance—and in that I concur—I am myself disposed to think that it would be bad legislation and bad policy to withhold the $125,000 which he says is absolutely necessary to have the statistics tabulated and the publications made. But I sincerely hope that after this Congress we will not have another application for further appropriations and an extension of time.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I very much appreciate the attitude of the Senator from Missouri, and I want to assure him that if this appropriation is made, no further request will be made on the part of the commission. I am perfectly confident that the work can be completed for this sum, and that when it is completed the country will think that the investment has been a good one.

The truth is we have lived a century without any investigation, from a scientific standpoint or other methodical means, looking to a consideration of this great question of immigration to this country, and the commission thought that the question was one of such vast importance that it warranted the broad scope it has assumed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I made the inquiry because I desired the information which the Senator from Vermont has given in a very clear and satisfactory manner. I confess that the labors of the commission have covered a breadth of inquiry that I did not myself know of. I recognize the very great importance of it from the outline given us by the honorable Senator from Vermont. I think I may properly congratulate the commission upon the fact that I made the inquiry, because I think, in the absence of the inquiry, the statement which has been made, as it should have been made, in justice to the commission itself, might not have been made.

I confess, Mr. President, that from what I have seen in the way of newspaper criticism and criticism elsewhere, I was not prepared for the statement which the Senator has made, and I recognize that not only in what has been done in the accumulation of information and in the reports made upon the subjects already concluded, but in the part which is now in process of conclusion, there is a great deal of the utmost importance to the people of this country.

There is a very widespread feeling in my part of the country that immigration has not been sufficiently guarded, and I think it is of the utmost importance that the information such as is indicated by the Senator from Vermont should be given to the people, in order that they may know what has been done and what is the effect of it, in order that they may the more properly determine what shall be done in the future.

While I know nothing about whether the expenditure has been properly made or not, of course I can not do otherwise than rely upon the judgment and good faith of those who have had in charge this work. For myself I think the work ought to be completed. I am not prepared to say whether the amount asked for is proper or not. I can only rely upon the Senators when they ask for it and say it is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as I may be called from the Chamber, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine for some information as to an item passed over. It is on page 8. It is in the bill as it came from the House, and I presume has had full investigation there. It is an item of $100,000 for furnishing the post-office and custom-house at Cleveland, Ohio. That ordinarily would appear to be quite an extravagant amount, unless the furniture includes fixtures. I do not know whether it is meant to include fixtures or only the ordinary articles which are generally included under the term "furnishings."

Mr. HALE. The items covered in this provision came from the Treasury Department as necessary for the equipment and installation of the building, and the House committee hearings show the testimony that was furnished in the case.

I will say to the Senator that there will be here an additional item for this very purpose beyond the sum covered in this bill for the Cleveland post-office.

Mr. BACON. Do you mean for furnishing it?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. An amount additional to the hundred thousand?

Mr. HALE. An additional item, from the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a very important port; it is a large custom-house; it is a new building, and practically it is all left to the Treasury Department to make examination and make the estimates and give the items in detail. The House committee adopted this sum, and there will be another amendment offered.

Mr. BACON. What is the additional amount?

Mr. HALE. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. BACON. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars for furnishing the building?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. It may be all right, but I confess that for furnishing a building, a single building, with office furniture, $150,000 appears to me to be a large sum.

Mr. BURTON. I think I can explain it to the Senator from Georgia. This is a building which has been under way a considerable number of years. The total cost, including the site, is $3,750,000. The building is to be finished on the 1st of November next. No provision has been made for furniture. The furniture must be contracted for at this time. Otherwise when the structure is completed it can not be utilized.

Mr. BACON. The inquiry which I made was directed to the question as to the character of the furniture, office furniture, for a single building, which would amount to $150,000. Of course there can be fixtures put in a building which would bring it up to a very much larger sum than that.

Mr. BURTON. This includes electric-light fixtures and some others, and not merely sofas and tables and chairs.

Mr. BACON. It includes everything?

Mr. BURTON. Everything that can be legally classed as fixtures.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator understand that it includes such fixtures as are found in bank buildings and structures of that kind——

Mr. BURTON. Yes; most of them.

Mr. BACON. Not ordinarily classed under the head of furniture.

Mr. BURTON. I think all of them, practically.

Mr. BACON. Of course, if that is the class of articles embraced in the proposed expenditure, it can very easily run up to that amount; but, under the ordinary head of "furniture," it seems to me to be very extravagant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 37, after line 13, to insert:

SENATE.

The Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay to James V. Brooke, clerk to the Hon. F. L. Thompson, of North Dakota, from November 11 to December 6, 1909, and to Hancock Robinson, clerk to the Hon. JAMES GORDON, of Mississippi, from January 1 to January 4, 1910, for clerical services rendered, from the appropriation for salaries of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, for the fiscal year 1910.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 24, to insert:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 4, to insert:

For additional amount for purchase of an automobile, including driving, maintenance, and care of the same, for use of the Vice-President, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 7, to insert:

For purchase of furniture, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 9, to insert:

To pay George Boyd for compiling customs tariffs, $250.

Mr. HALE. In line 10, after the name "George," I move to insert the initial "H."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 13, to insert:

The allotment for printing and binding for Congress is hereby made available for the printing as public documents of such of the publications of the National Monetary Commission as the commission may designate. And the superintendent of documents is hereby authorized to order reprinted, from time to time, such public documents of the National Monetary Commission as may be required for sale: Provided, That the appropriations for printing and binding shall be reimbursed for the cost of such reprints from the moneys received by the superintendent of documents from the sale of public documents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 24, to insert:

The allotment for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, is hereby made available for the printing and binding of the International Bureau of American Republics in the sum of $3,478.83, being amount of charges remitted by the Joint Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 5, to insert:

JUDGMENTS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

For payment of the final judgments and decrees, including costs of suit, which have been rendered under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," certified to Congress at its present session by the Attorney-General in House Document No. 535, and which have not been appealed, namely:

Under the War Department, $2,836.14;
Under the Navy Department, $4,014.85;
Under the Department of Commerce and Labor, $3,257.15;
Under the Department of Justice, $225.40;

In all, $10,333.54, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on the respective judgments at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date thereof until the time this appropriation is made: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 4, to insert:

JUDGMENTS IN INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

For payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases, certified to Congress in Senate Document No. 320, at its present session, $26,437; said judgments to be paid after the deductions required to be made under the provisions of section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled, "An act to provide for the adjustment and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," shall have been ascertained and duly certified by the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of the Treasury, which certification shall be made as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, and such deductions shall be made according to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, having due regard to the educational and other necessary requirements of the tribe or tribes affected; and the amounts paid shall be reimbursed to the United States at such times and in such proportions as the Secretary of the Interior may decide to be for the interests of the Indian service: Provided, That no one of said judgments provided in this paragraph shall be paid until the Attorney-General shall have certified to the Secretary of the Treasury that there exist no grounds sufficient, in his opinion, to support a motion for a new trial or an appeal of said cause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 9, after the word "thirty-seven," to insert "and Senate Document No. 337," so as to make the clause read:

For the payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, reported to Congress at its present session in House Document No. 437 and Senate Document No. 337.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 16, before the word "cents," to strike out "six hundred and twelve dollars and forty-one" and insert "nine hundred and eighty dollars and seventy-four," so as to make the clause read:

Under War Department, $26,980.74.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 19, before the word "cents," to strike out "and $85.87" and insert "$39.02," so as to make the clause read:

Under Navy Department, $2,239.02.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 20, after the word "Interior," to strike out "$38,240" and insert "$47,269.61," so as to make the clause read:

Under Department of the Interior, $47,269.61.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 24, before the word "In," to insert "Under Department of Justice, $842.23;" and on page 43, line 1, before the word "cents," to strike out "$67,082.73" and insert "$77,476.05," so as to make the clause read:

Under Department of Justice, $842.23; in all, $77,476.05: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Claims allowed by the Auditor for the Treasury Department," on page 44, line 21, before the word "cents," to strike out "forty" and insert "forty-nine," so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of Revenue-Cutter Service, $1,116.49.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Claims allowed by the Auditor for the War Department," on page 46, line 16, before the word "hundred," to strike out "ninety-eight" and insert "ninety-seven," so as to make the clause read:

For transportation of the army and its supplies, except the claim No. 9787, $40,944.73.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 17, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. That for the payment of the following claims, certified to be due by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year 1907 and prior years, unless otherwise stated, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in Senate Document No. 333, reported to Congress at its present session, there is appropriated as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I offer an amendment to come in on page 27, after line 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to complete the classification and appraisement of the lands of the Yakima Reservation, in the State of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of the act of December 21, 1904, entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the Yakima Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington," $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That this sum shall be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds of the sale of the surplus lands of said reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and subject to amendment. All the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. BURTON. On page 8, line 12, after the words "one hundred," I move to insert "and sixty," so as to read:

Furnishing new post-office, custom-house, and court-house, Cleveland, Ohio: For furniture equipment corresponding to the present regulation designs, for the new post-office, custom-house, and court-house building at Cleveland, Ohio, $160,000.

Mr. HALE. Is this matter submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BURTON. I will state that it is. I have a letter here from the Secretary of the Treasury stating that $60,000 is needed in addition to the $100,000 appropriated.

Mr. HALE. Let the letter be printed in the RECORD. I do not object to the amendment.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 27, 1910.

Hon. T. E. BURTON,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 25th instant, stating that complaint has been made that the amounts available or recommended will not be sufficient to provide proper fixtures for the new post-office, custom house, and court-house building at Cleveland, Ohio.

The urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 18282) contains a provision of $100,000 for furniture equipment corresponding to the present regulation designs of the department. This amount is sufficient only for the use of equipment which the department can furnish under its usual contracts. The interior trim and decoration of the Cleveland building are such as to require furniture and lighting fixtures of special design. The court rooms and offices of some of the principal officials are trimmed in Circassian walnut, while all the other rooms in the building are finished in mahogany. To equip the entire building with furniture and fixtures in keeping with the trim of the rooms it is estimated that an appropriation of $60,000 will be needed in addition to the $100,000 referred to above.

Respectfully, C. D. HILLES, Acting Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKELEY. I wish to give notice that I shall raise a point of order in the Senate on the amendment on page 30 regarding the salaries of the judges, officers, and employees of the court of customs appeals on the ground that it is general legislation and changes existing law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Connecticut for that purpose when the bill is in the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BULKELEY. On page 30, line 9, under the head of "Judicial," after the words "United States court of customs appeals," the following amendment was inserted as in Committee of the Whole:

The salaries of the judges, officers, and employees of the United States court of customs appeals, authorized by the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," shall hereafter be at the rates per annum as follows:

Looking at the language of the act passed at the special session, I find in section 29:

That a United States court of customs appeals is hereby created, and said court shall consist of a presiding judge and four associate judges appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, each of whom shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum.

I raise the point of order that this amendment is general legislation and changes existing law on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in order to throw the whole matter into conference—I see the point the Senator makes—I move to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. BULKELEY. If the Senator makes that motion I will withdraw the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws the point of order and the Senator from Maine moves to strike out the entire paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. That is all, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. As I shall be called away from the Senate on public business and desire a short executive session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move to take up the army appropriation bill, House bill 15384.

Mr. KEAN. Let the unfinished business be first temporarily laid aside.

Mr. WARREN. I was waiting until 2 o'clock.

Mr. KEAN. It is just 2 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15384, the army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15384) making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 1, line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty," so as to make the clause read:

Contingencies of the army: For all contingent expenses of the army not otherwise provided for, and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff, to be expended under the immediate orders of the Secretary of War, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Chief of Staff," on page 3, line 15, after the word "instructors," to insert "and students," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the provisions of section 1330, Revised Statutes, authorizing leaves of absence to certain officers of the Military Academy, during the period of the suspension of the ordinary academic studies, without deduction from pay and allowances, be, and are hereby, extended to include officers on duty exclusively as instructors and students at the service schools on approval of the officer in charge of said schools.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay of officers of the line," on page 6, line 13, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow payments for exercising higher command under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved April 26, 1898 (30 Stat. L., 364), which have been made between the date of the passage of said act and March 18, 1907, in accordance with the regulations and decisions then existing: Provided, That where disallowances have been made in the settlement of claims filed by officers of the army for arrears on account of foreign service, increase of pay, and other causes, the Auditor of the Treasury for the War Department is hereby authorized to reopen said settlements and credit to the claimants any sums which have heretofore been deducted under the head of increased pay for the exercise of higher command.

So as to make the clause read:

For pay of officers of the line, $7,211,700: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay of enlisted men," on page 7, after line 12, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That one of the two "blacksmiths and farriers" now authorized by law for each troop of cavalry shall hereafter be designated as "horseshoer" and receive the pay of a sergeant of cavalry, and the other shall hereafter be designated as "farrier" and receive the pay of a corporal of cavalry; and that one of the "mechanics" now authorized by law for each battery of field artillery shall hereafter be designated as "horseshoer" and receive the pay of a sergeant of artillery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Corps of Engineers," on page 7, line 23, before the word "hundred," to strike out "Four" and insert "For pay of enlisted men, four," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of enlisted men, $475,716.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 25, after the word "Additional," to insert "pay," so as to make the clause read:

Additional pay for length of service, $66,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Ordnance Department," on page 8, line 2, before the word "hundred," to strike out "Two" and insert "For pay of enlisted men, two," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of enlisted men, $216,036.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quartermaster's Department," on page 8, line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "Two" and insert "For pay of two," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 200 post quartermaster-sergeants, at $45 per month each, $108,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Subsistence Department," on page 8, line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "Two" and insert "For pay of two," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 207 post commissary-sergeants, at $45 per month each, $111,780.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Signal Corps," on page 8, line 19, before the word "master," to strike out "42" and insert "For pay of 42," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 42 master signal electricians, at $900 each, $37,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 22, before the word "hundred," to strike out "One" and insert "For pay of one," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 132 first-class sergeants, at $540 each, $71,280.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 1, before the word "hundred," to strike out "One" and insert "For pay of one," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 144 sergeants, at $36 per month each, $62,208.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 4, before the word "cooks," to strike out "24" and insert "For pay of 24," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 24 cooks, at $30 per month each, $8,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "One" and insert "For pay of one," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 156 corporals, at $24 per month each, $44,928.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 7, to insert:

The Secretary of War is authorized, under requisition of the governor of a State or Territory or the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia, to pay to the quartermaster-general or such other officer of the militia as may be duly designated and appointed for the purpose so much of its allotment under the annual appropriation authorized by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, as shall be necessary for the payment, subsistence, transportation, and other expenses of such portion of the organized militia as may engage in encampments, maneuvers, and field instruction with any part of the Regular Army at or near any military post or camp or lake or seacoast defense of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Subsistence Department," in the item of appropriation for the purchase of subsistence supplies, on page 23, line 23, after the word "expended," to strike out "to defray the cost of furnishing food, and for providing extra-duty pay for cooks, assistant cooks, and waiters, and for perishable table equipment in subsisting enlisted men of the Regular Army and the organized militia who may be competitors in the national rifle match: And provided further, That no competitor who is thus subsisted shall be entitled to commutation of rations, and no greater expense shall be incurred than $1.50 per man per day for the period the contest is in progress," and insert "for supplying meals or furnishing commutation of rations to enlisted men of the Regular Army and the organized militia who may be competitors in the national rifle match: And provided further, That no competitor shall be entitled to commutation of rations in excess of $1.50 per diem, and when meals are furnished no greater expense than that sum shall be incurred per man per diem for the period the contest is in progress," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the sum of $12,000 is authorized to be expended for supplying meals or furnishing commutation of rations to enlisted men of the Regular Army and the organized militia who may be competitors in the national rifle match: And provided further, That no competitor shall be entitled to commutation of rations in excess of $1.50 per diem, and when meals are furnished no greater expense than that sum shall be incurred per man per diem for the period the contest is in progress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quartermaster's Department," in the item of appropriation for regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, on page 27, line 14, after the word "separation," to insert:

And the Auditor for the War Department is authorized and directed to remove all suspensions or disallowances in accounts of quartermasters for the supply of said allowances under such circumstances, and the Quartermaster-General is authorized to repay to officers any sums collected from them in payment therefor.

So as to read:

And hereafter, when an officer is separated from his authorized number of owned horses through the nature of the military service upon which employed, they shall not be deprived of forage, bedding, shelter, shoeing, or medicines therefor, because of such separation, and the Auditor for the War Department is authorized and directed to remove all suspensions or disallowances in accounts of quartermasters for the supply of said allowances under such circumstances, and the Quartermaster-General is authorized to repay to officers any sums collected from them in payment therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the purchase of horses for cavalry, artillery, and engineers, on page 32, line 15, after the word "horses," to insert the following further proviso:

And provided further, That hereafter when a mounted officer is ordered to duty beyond the seas or to make a change of station in the United States in which the cost of transportation for his authorized number of owned horses exceeds the sum at the time allowed for that purpose in the Army Regulations, the Secretary of War is authorized, under such regulations in respect to inspection and valuation as he may prescribe, in his discretion to permit the purchase of said horses by the Quartermaster's Department, at a price not exceeding the average contract price paid for horses during the preceding fiscal year, the exact price to be fixed by a board of officers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 3, after the word "quarters," to strike out:

For barracks and quarters for troops, other than seacoast artillery, storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, for offices, recruiting stations, to provide such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and officers' quarters at military posts as may be approved by the Secretary of War; for the hire of buildings and grounds for summer cantonments, and for temporary buildings at frontier stations, for the construction of temporary buildings and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts, including the extra-duty pay of enlisted men employed on the same: Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or for quarters to officers or enlisted men: Provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster's Department, including those paid from the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee paid therefrom shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War—

And insert—

For barracks, quarters, stables, storehouses, magazines, administration and office buildings, sheds, shops, and other buildings necessary for the shelter of troops, public animals, and stores, and for administration purposes, except those pertaining to the Seacoast Artillery; for repairing public buildings at military posts; for extra-duty pay to enlisted men and hire of employees; for rental of the authorized allowance of quarters for officers on duty with the troops at posts and stations where no public quarters are available; of barracks or authorized allowance of quarters for noncommissioned officers and enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available; of grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes, and of buildings or portions of buildings for occupation by troops, for use as stables, storehouses, and offices, and for other military purposes; for the hire of recruiting stations and lodgings for recruits; for such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and for officers' quarters at military posts, and for sales to officers, as may be approved by the Secretary of War; for wall lockers in permanent barracks and refrigerators in barracks and quarters; for screen doors, window screens, storm doors and sash, and window shades for barracks, offices, and quarters, and for flooring and framing for tents: Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or quarters to officers or enlisted men: Provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster-General's Department, including those paid from the fund appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee paid therefrom shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War.

So as to make the clause read:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks, quarters, stables, storehouses, magazines, administration and office buildings, sheds, shops, and other buildings necessary for the shelter of troops, public animals, and stores, and for administration purposes, except those pertaining to the Seacoast Artillery; for repairing public buildings at military posts; for extra pay to enlisted men and hire of employees; for rental of the authorized allowance of quarters for officers on duty with the troops at posts and stations where no public quarters are available; of barracks or authorized allowance of quarters for noncommissioned officers and enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available; of grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes, and of buildings or portions of buildings for occupation by troops, for use as stables, storehouses, and offices, and for other military purposes; for the hire of recruiting stations and lodgings for recruits; for such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and for officers' quarters at military posts, and for sales to officers, as may be approved by the Secretary of War; for wall lockers in permanent barracks and refrigerators in barracks and quarters; for screen doors, window screens, storm doors and sash, and window shades for barracks, offices, and quarters, and for flooring and framing for tents: Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or quarters to officers or enlisted men: Provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster-General's Department, including those paid from the fund appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee paid therefrom shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War, $1,600,631.

The amendment was agreed to.

Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands: Continuing the work of providing for the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, including repairs and payment of rents, the acquisition of title to building sites, and such additions to existing military reservations as may be necessary, and including also shelter for the animals and supplies, and all other buildings necessary for post administration purposes, $375,000: Provided, That no part of said $375,000 shall be expended for the construction of quarters for officers of the army, the total cost of which, including the heating and plumbing apparatus, wiring and fixtures, shall exceed in the case of quarters of a general officer the sum of $10,000; of a colonel or officer above the rank of captain, $7,500; of an officer of the rank of captain, $5,000; and of an officer below the rank of captain, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, after line 11, to insert:

Hereafter all moneys arising from disposition of serviceable quartermaster's supplies or stores, authorized by law and regulations, shall remain available throughout the fiscal year following that in which the disposition was effected, for the purposes of that appropriation from which such supplies were authorized to be supplied at the time of the disposition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for construction and repair of hospitals, on page 43, line 3, after the words "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That of this sum there may be used for the construction of a modern hospital at Fort Missoula, Mont., $45,000; for the construction of a modern hospital at Fort H. G. Wright, N. Y., $50,000; for the enlargement of the hospital at Fort George Wright, Wash., $25,000; and for the construction of quarters for nurses at the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "eighty-four," so as to read:

Shooting galleries and ranges: For shelter, shooting galleries, ranges for small-arms target practice, repairs, and expenses incident thereto, such ranges and galleries to be open, as far as practicable, to the national guard and organized rifle clubs under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, $184,125.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for shooting galleries and ranges, on page 44, line 7, after the word "Texas," to insert the following further proviso:

Provided further, That of the above sum there may be used and made immediately available $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the construction and equipment of a target range for the field firing of the artillery, cavalry, and infantry branches of the United States Army, and for machine guns, including the construction of a concrete storehouse, portable railroad, and improvements on camp sites for water and sanitation, on land authorized to be acquired near Sparta, Monroe County, Wis., as a site for a target range, and for all other absolutely necessary expenses in connection therewith; and $24,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the completion of rifle range of the military reservation of Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo.

The amendment was agreed to.

In all other cases contracts shall be prepared under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Chief of Ordnance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 23, to insert:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make such issues of ordnance and ordnance stores, from time to time, without charging the cost or value thereof, to the governor of each State and Territory, and to the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, as are required to keep on hand a sufficient supply of arms and the necessary accouterments and equipments therefor, of the model that may at the time of any issue be in use by the corresponding arm, corps, or department of the Regular Army, for the use of the maximum number of organized militia authorized by law or regulations; such issues to remain the property of the United States and to be accounted for as now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DEWITT EASTMAN.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, I inquire if it is in order at this time to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill on the calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. BULKELEY. Then I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 614) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Dewitt Eastman," approved January 8, 1909.

The bill was read, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "sixty-five," to insert "and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to issue to him an honorable discharge as of said date;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Dewitt Eastman shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of Battery I, Fourth Regiment United States Artillery, on the 13th of June, 1865, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to issue to him an honorable discharge as of said date: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, if it be in order, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate when it would be convenient for him to report the resolution submitted by me and referred to his committee on January 5?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the resolution?

Mr. ELKINS. The resolution is No. 115. It relates to the cost of living.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from West Virginia to inform me what is his pleasure in the matter.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not like to disclose personal conversations had with my amiable friend the Senator from New Jersey about this or any other subject, but I am sure he will not be offended if I say I have asked him almost every day that I have been in the Senate for the past two or three weeks to report the resolution favorably or unfavorably. All I desired was that the resolution be reported for action by the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. I will endeavor at the proper time, when reports of committees are in order, either to report or not to report the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. I hope the Senator will agree to one thing or the other, either to make some report or not to on the resolution. I think this is due the Senate and myself as the author of the resolution. I do not understand that even so able and experienced a chairman as he is of his committee has a right to indefinitely postpone the consideration of a resolution before his committee. I think it is due to a Senator and the Senate, when a resolution is introduced in good faith, to have it acted upon. I do not want it to sleep the sleep of death in some pigeonhole of the Senator's committee room. The subject is too important. Eighty millions of people are demanding to know why the cost of living is advancing, and if there is not some remedy to stop this alarming increase. For my part, I earnestly desire a fair and impartial investigation of this great subject. The Senate owes it to the people of the United States to promptly examine into and investigate the high and advancing cost of living, and if any remedy can be found by legislation, to take prompt action. At least the Senate can ascertain the facts and report them to the country.

FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. DIXON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3983) to amend the act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 302), entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," and all amendments thereto.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 302), entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana," and all amendments thereto, be amended by adding thereto the following sections:

"SEC. 23. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to immediately cause to be surveyed and subdivided into lots, not less than 2 acres and not more than 5 acres, all of the unallotted lands fronting on Flathead Lake, in the State of Montana, that are embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, whether classified as grazing, agricultural, or timber lands.

"That when said lands are so surveyed and subdivided into lots as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Interior shall sell the same to the highest bidder, either at public sale or under sealed bids, as in his judgment he shall deem best for the interest of the confederated tribes of the Flathead, Kootenai, and Upper Pend d'Oreille Indians. The proceeds from the sale of said lands, after deducting the expenses of the survey and sale of the lands, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and expended as heretofore provided in section 14 as amended by the act of May 29, 1908.

"SEC. 24. That where allotments of lands have been made in severalty to said Indians from the lands embraced within the area of said Flathead Indian Reservation, which are or may be irrigable lands, the Secretary of the Interior may, upon application of the Indian allottee, sell and dispose of not to exceed 60 acres of such individual allotment of land under such terms and conditions of sale as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, one half of the proceeds of the sale of said individual allotment to be paid to the Indian allottee and the remaining half of the proceeds of sale to be held in trust for the said Indian allottee, upon which he shall be paid annually not less than 3 per cent interest, the remaining principal sum to be paid to said allottee or his heirs when the full period of his trust patent for the remaining lands covered by his allotment shall have expired, or sooner, should the Secretary of the Interior, in his judgment, deem it best for said Indian allottee.

"And in the event of the failure, neglect, or refusal of any such allottee to relinquish any allotment made to him on any land reserved or necessary for reservoir sites, as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to bring action under the provision of the laws of the State of Montana to condemn and acquire title to any and all lands necessary or useful for said reservoir sites that have heretofore been allotted on said Flathead Indian Reservation lands."

Mr. DIXON. I offer an amendment to the amendment. In preparing the report my stenographer inadvertently left out a part of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, and the amendment is to cover that. It should be inserted after the word "allottee," on line 3, page 5.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert, after the word "allottee," in line 3, page 5, the following:

SEC. 25. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to set aside and reserve so much of the surplus unallotted and otherwise unreserved lands of the Flathead Indian Reservation as may be necessary to provide an allotment to each Indian having an allotment on any of the lands set aside and reserved for power or reservoir sites, as authorized by section 22 of the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 796), who may relinquish his allotment within such power or reservoir site.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. PURCELL] to fill the vacancy on the joint committee authorizing an investigation of the Interior Department and the Bureau of Forestry, Agricultural Department, caused by the resignation of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator from Arkansas rise?

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment which will be stated.

The Chair would like to be advised whether the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is present. The Senator from Iowa had an amendment printed, but, as the Chair recollects, it was not offered, but simply submitted for the information of the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Iowa will return to the Chamber presently.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was not offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 15, strike out the word "public" and insert "state or national," so that it will read:

That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks, subject to state or national supervision and examination in the State or Territory, and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood, etc.

Mr. CARTER. The committee understood the word "public" to embrace state or national inspection and examination. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas makes that more explicit, perchance, and I see no objection to its adoption.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the only purpose I had in mind in offering the amendment was to fix it so that the board of trustees having in charge this money might not so interpret the word "public" with respect to examination and inspection as that it should mean only a national inspection and examination. This does not help my State. Neither does it help any of the other Southern States—Mississippi, Virginia, Tennessee—which have no law relating to inspection and examination of banks. But it does make it certain that either state or national inspection is all that is required by this bill; and I thank the Senator in charge of the bill very much for accepting the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah presents an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 12, after the word "received," at the end of the line, insert:

Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay not less than 2½ per cent interest.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from Utah the propriety of inserting "willing to retain it and to comply with the provisions of this law with reference to security." It might be well as a matter of caution to insert those words.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment says, "money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees as herein provided;" that is, as provided in this bill.

Mr. CARTER. Let the amendment as proposed be read again at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I observe that the Senator's amendment provides for the point I had in mind.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to inquire if it is the purpose of this amendment to fix the rate absolutely for all future time at 2½ per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. The rate of 2½ per cent is provided for in the bill, and the amendment provides that this money shall not be withdrawn for any other purpose than to pay depositors and other obligations of the Government under the act, so long as the banks where the money is deposited desire that it shall remain there and are willing to pay not less than 2½ per cent interest.

Mr. PAGE. But I do not understand that this bill does absolutely fix the rate at 2½ per cent, but rather says it shall not be less than 2½ per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just exactly what my amendment says—and pay not less than 2½ per cent interest.

Mr. PAGE. But suppose in the future it should be found necessary or best for all in interest that this rate be changed. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Utah would make it impossible to change that rate so long as the bank was willing to pay 2½ per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole bill would have to be amended then, because this amendment simply follows out the provisions of the bill. The Senator will find it in the bill itself. It says that the rate of interest shall not be less than 2½ per cent.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; but it may be more, it seems to me.

Mr. SMOOT. And so it may be with this amendment.

Mr. PAGE. No. But having been once deposited at 2½ per cent, it is beyond the power of the trustees to withdraw that fund so long as the bank is willing to pay 2½ per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. So long as they are willing to pay not less than 2½ per cent. That is what the amendment states.

Mr. PAGE. I may be wrong in my understanding of the amendment, but it seems to me it fixes the rate so that it is beyond the power of the trustees to change it.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be beyond their power to accept a less rate than 2½ per cent, but not a greater one.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, it seems to me there is something in the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont; that is, that the effect of this amendment and the effect of the bill as it is now presented is to fix a rate, a stipulated rate, and have that rate prevail for all time to come. I do not say it is 2½. It can not be less than 2½, but it must be some rate—2½ or 2½ or 3 per cent—and whatever rate it is is fixed for all time to come, and a contract relation is established between the banks and the Government as the depositor in which the rate is fixed forever, irrepealably.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the attention of the Senator to section 8 of the bill, in which it is said:

That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory, and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very true. I am not stating that the Senator's amendment changes that provision, but I do call attention to the fact that this provision, as well as the Senator's amendment, contemplates that a rate shall be fixed——

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD (continuing). At the time the deposit is made, and it shall remain at that fixed rate for all time to come.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless by amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; there is no "unless" about it. It is a contract, and a subsequent act can not annul the contract. It is a contractual relation.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as that is concerned——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can you withdraw a deposit simply because you can not get a higher rate of interest than you have agreed to accept by contract? I do not so understand it. I should think that ought to be made clear here. Is money to be deposited in one of these banks, with a stipulation fixing the rate of interest—2½, or 2½, or 3 per cent—and is that contract to run forever and that rate of interest to be fixed and remain unchanged for all time to come and a contract established that can not be repealed?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the provisions of this bill the board of trustees can withdraw this money.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They can withdraw it for what purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. For the payment of depositors.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They can withdraw it for the payment of depositors; but suppose the depositor elects to leave it there?

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Government is not out anything in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is possibly true. If the depositors are satisfied, that may leave the question where it will be safe.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think this is such an important matter that no ambiguity should be left in the text. The construction suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], supported by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], might obtain as to this particular amendment. Unquestionably the board of trustees may in the beginning fix the rate of interest to be paid by a bank, subject to the limitation that it shall not be less than 2½ per cent per annum. But this amendment deals with the withdrawal of money, and as far as its provisions go would seem susceptible of the construction that the rate of interest fixed by the board on the receipt of the deposit could not thereafter be changed by the board. That might lead to the situation of two rates of interest, one on a set of deposits received prior to a certain date and another rate on other deposits received at a subsequent time, whereas it seems desirable that the rate of interest should be uniform all the time and everywhere.

Mr. President, I can see no objection to the insertion here of language that will relieve this of any ambiguity. I suggest, without having the text before me, that the substance be inserted as follows:

Retain it at such rate of interest, not less than 2½ per centum per annum, as the board may prescribe.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator understand that in the operation of this law there would be one invariable rate of interest for the whole country as to all the banks in which deposits are made or that the board would have discretion to fix the rate according to conditions in different localities?

Mr. CARTER. I presume the rates will be fixed by the board. There is nothing in the law requiring uniformity of rate. But I should think in the execution of the law, inasmuch as the funds in the respective States are to be retained there, that uniformity of rate would be just and fair throughout the whole country. But the board is not bound to establish a uniform rate.

Mr. BURTON. Then the Senator from Montana does not consider this bill as intimating any rule to the board upon that point?

Mr. CARTER. No; no rules are established by the bill.

Mr. BURTON. That is left to their discretion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, referring to the remarks of the Senator from Montana, it seems to me that there can be no question about the rate of interest, or that there could be a higher rate of interest than 2½ per cent for this reason: If the board should increase that interest, say, to 3 per cent, all that the depositor would have to do would be to withdraw his money and redeposit it at 3 per cent, and even if he did not withdraw his deposit, then, of course, it would draw the 2½ per cent, as provided in the contract at the time of deposit.

Mr. CARTER. I doubt if the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Montana understand the "depositor" in the same sense. This amendment goes to the deposit in the bank by the Government, not by the original depositor at the post-office. He is disposed of by the postmaster.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana is correct.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not like any feature of the amendment of the Senator from Utah. I believe there ought to be no conditions imposed which would prevent the trustees acting in their discretion. The time is coming, it seems to me, when the whole question of interest may be very important, and for this reason: We are now making a law, as it seems to me, which virtually makes the Government a preferred creditor. For one, I think the commercial interests of the States should be regarded and protected. If we have a bank in our little village doing a business which invites deposits from merchants generally, those merchants take a risk, and have been taking a risk for years, which is the ordinary risk of a creditor, and that is all right. I think the merchant should stand absolutely upon a par with the Government. I do not believe there should be any preferred creditor in connection with this matter.

I do not think very much loss would grow out of taking the ordinary risk of banking; and we may well later on think it better to make the rate 2½ per cent and let the added one-quarter per cent cover the risk and not insist upon the bank taking all its assets and shoving them up to the Government for these deposits, so that when it comes to fail, if it does, the merchants and the ordinary business men will be compelled to take the poorer assets which are left.

I do not like that provision. But I imagine it may be taken care of by the trustees under this bill if we do not hamper them by some such restriction as that suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The object of this amendment is not to interfere with the interest rate whatever, because that is provided for in section 8 of the bill. But it is for the purpose of retaining the money deposited in one section of the country in that particular section.

Mr. PAGE. Let us imagine a case that may arise. A deposit of these funds may be made in the banks of Utah. Those banks may create a little trust of their own, and say "We will agree to pay 2¼ per cent, and we will not pay any more." Under this statute you are compelled to leave the money in Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. No. The Senator has not read the bill carefully when he makes that statement.

Mr. PAGE. I have listened to your amendment, Mr. Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is provided in the bill, in the same section—

If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Mr. PAGE. But this fund can not be withdrawn except for the purpose of paying depositors.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. It can not, under your restrictions, be withdrawn because the bank refuses to pay more than a given rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all, Mr. President. This fund, if the bank refuses to take it, can be withdrawn for the payment of the postal savings depositor or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, and so forth.

Mr. PAGE. But having been deposited, the amendment of the Senator from Utah, as I understand, enjoins the trustees from withdrawing it, and that is the condition to which I object.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, withdrawing it with the exception of some specific purpose—for the purpose of paying the depositor.

Mr. PAGE. Yes. I do not imagine that case will ever arise.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the whole difference between the Senator from Vermont and myself is this, that he thinks the trustees ought to have the power to withdraw all this money from one State and put it anywhere else they desire.

Mr. PAGE. Most assuredly, Mr. President. If there should be a combine in Utah or Vermont that would say, "We will not pay more than 2¼ per cent," having secured the deposits, the amendment of the Senator from Utah has so arranged matters that the trustees under this bill are forbidden to withdraw it, and the trust can continue to enjoy indefinitely the 2¼ per cent rate, while in other States, where there is no combination, no trust, the banks might be paying 3 or 4 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator an amendment which I think he will accept. It is that the amendment shall read as follows:

Provided, That money deposited in banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees as herein provided shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed from time to time by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2¼ per cent per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite willing to accept it.

Mr. PAGE. I am in hearty accord with that amendment. I do not see any objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah accept it in lieu of his amendment or does the Senator from Utah withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I will accept it as a modification of my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the modification of the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, at the end of line 12, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That money deposited in banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees as herein provided shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed from time to time by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2¼ per cent per annum.

Mr. PILES. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Under the amendment, as I catch it from the reading, can a deposit be withdrawn for the purpose of investment?

Mr. CARTER. It can not be withdrawn for the purpose of investment so long as the money is not needed to pay, for instance, the current expenses of administration and the obligations of the Government under the act, and it can only be withdrawn then in case the banks refuse to pay the rate of interest or to give the security.

Mr. PILES. Then, under the amendment is it not possible, if the banks in a given State should believe that they were unable to pay more than 2¾ per cent, we will say, by way of illustration, that every dollar of the money raised in the State and deposited in the local banks could be removed from that State to another State which would pay 2¾ per cent?

If that is the purpose of the amendment, I am not in favor of it; because it seems to me that it would be much better to permit the banks in a State to pay only 2¼ per cent rather than to have it removed, for instance, from the State of Washington to the State of Vermont. In other words, I prefer that the people of the State of Washington should deposit their money in their local banks, and if the local banks are unable to pay more than 2¼ per cent that the people of that State shall have the benefit of that fund in the State rather than that it should go to the State of Vermont for 2¾ per cent. Do I understand that that is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. CARTER and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. CARTER. I will let the Senator from Utah explain it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington must certainly understand that the board of trustees can not make one rate for one section and another rate for another; at least it is not so contemplated in this bill.

Mr. FLINT. I understood the Senator from Montana to say a moment ago that the act did not provide for a uniform rate and that the board of trustees might make one rate at one place and another rate at another place.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator misunderstood the Senator from Montana in his construction of the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. The statement of the Senator from Montana was that the act did not pretend to prescribe any rule with reference to interest binding upon the board except that the rate should be at least 2¼ per cent. He further stated that in the administration of the law the board would unquestionably be called upon to establish a uniform rate throughout the country.

Mr. SMOOT. And along that line I was simply saying to the Senator from Washington that I did not believe the trustees would at any time make one rate for one section of the country and another rate for another section of the country.

The amendment simply means that at the present time the rate will be 2¼ per cent per annum, but if some unfortunate circumstances should arise, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], and the rate should be 2¾ or 3¼ per cent per annum, then the banks all over the country must pay that rate, or else the money can be withdrawn from those banks.

Mr. PILES. Then let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose the banks should start in at a rate of 2¼ per cent; that the board of trustees should raise the rate to 3 per cent; and the banks in the State of Utah should say they were unable to pay 3 per cent on account of financial conditions in that State; would not the board of trustees have the power under this law to remove the money from Utah, deposited by citizens of that State, to the State of Ohio, if the banks there would pay 3 per cent?

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator in that behalf. I think the bill would clearly prohibit the transaction to which he refers. The bill would not allow deposits refused in the State of Washington to be transferred to the State of Pennsylvania or to the State of Montana, but the money refused because of the refusal to pay the interest prescribed or to give the security required would then be invested in bonds of the United States or the classes of security prescribed in the act.

Mr. PILES. I am speaking of the amendment, which I have not seen, as it has not yet been printed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I may ask a question there, this money could not be invested in government securities except in a case where all the banks in the State refused to accept the money at the rate of 2½ per cent?

Mr. CARTER. Not less than 2½ per cent. Their refusal to accept it at the rate of 3 per cent would not justify investing the money in United States securities or anything else. It is only when they refuse to accept the money at a rate of not less than 2½ per cent.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, it is just a little amusing to hear my good friend from Washington suggest that Vermont would pay a rate that would call the money from Washington to Vermont. If the bidding for a rate was to determine this matter, I imagine that Utah would take all of our Vermont money without much doubt.

I wish to say in this connection that I do not suppose this bill will have very much to do with Vermont. Our banks there have the entire confidence and faith of the depositing public, and if I vote for the bill, as I expect to do, it is because it may do some good in those States which have not the banking facilities we have in Vermont. But if the question of bidding is to determine the location of this money, then certainly Vermont will have no share in it. Utah and Washington will probably get it all.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the rate is concerned, I want to say that in Utah it is about as low to-day as it is in Vermont.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Montana to answer the Senator from South Dakota—possibly it was just the reverse—that if this board fixed the rate of interest at 3 per cent and the banks of South Dakota refused to take the money at 3 per cent thereupon the board could not withdraw the money from the banks of South Dakota. If that be his construction of the bill, I am sure he is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. The board could not withdraw money from the banks of South Dakota to put it into the banks of Iowa or Utah, or any other State.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the board fixed the rate of interest at 3 per cent and the banks of South Dakota refused to take it at that rate, then the board could withdraw every penny of the money of South Dakota that was so refused and invest it in the securities that are named in this section; not deposit it in any bank, but invest it in government bonds or other bonds, or such other securities as the State of South Dakota permits its savings banks to invest their money in. But I want it to be perfectly clear that this does permit, as it is now drawn, the withdrawal of the money from a State if the banks of that State refuse to take it at the rate of interest that is prescribed by the board; and I do not believe there is any requirement in the bill that will compel the board to fix a uniform rate of interest throughout the United States.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have not made a careful, detailed study of the bill, but am I not correct in assuming that the rate of interest paid to the depositor is 2 per cent, and not more than 2 per cent? I do not mean the Government as the depositor, but to the individual whose savings are supposed to be promoted by the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is right.

Mr. CARTER. It is a uniform rate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is only 2 per cent. It occurs to me that it is hardly fair to the poor man, whose small earnings are being conserved by the bill, to confine him absolutely to a rate of 2 per cent and say that unless all the banks in his State shall agree to pay a rate not limited to 2½ per cent but some rate fixed by the board—it may be 4 per cent or it may be 5 per cent—the board can drain the money out of the community and invest it somewhere else. Yet the poor man whose pennies are being collected for the making of this fund is to receive only 2 per cent. Who gets the difference if it is being loaned at 4 or 5 per cent? Who gets the 3 per cent increment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly the Government gets the surplus.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should feel as though that was a satisfactory provision if the bill means that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Permit me to say that I agree with the Senator from South Dakota that this is not a scheme for profit on the part of the Government, and it ought not to be. I do not like the provision which will enable the Government to withdraw the money from a State if the banks of that State refuse to pay the interest that may be fixed by the board; but nevertheless——

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will pardon me, that is why I assume strongly that the only justification for removing the funds from a State or investing them elsewhere would be the refusal of all the banks in the State to pay the 2½ rate and not any rate above that which the board might fix.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was the original amendment, as I understood it, of the Senator from Utah, and I hoped that it would so remain, but under the persuasive influences of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] a change has been induced that will put all the States of the Union into competition with each other.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What change? The Senator says a change was made.

Mr. CUMMINS. If Vermont or any considerable number of States are willing to pay more than 2½ per cent, naturally the board will fix a higher rate for the entire country, and that may result in the very thing against which we have been contending, namely, the withdrawal of the money from the State in which it was collected.

I really hoped that the original amendment of the Senator from Utah would be adopted, for I do not believe that the Government wants to enter into an enterprise for the purpose of getting all the interest that the varying fortunes of the whole country will enable some particular locality to offer for these funds.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I would suggest that if the Government should take down the limit the poor man whose savings are making this fund should be the one to get the benefit of the increased rate, and not the Public Treasury.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to suggest, if I may add one additional word, that it seems to me if the original amendment of the Senator from Utah had been changed to the extent only of creating or taking advantage of competition in the State itself our general purpose would have been served, and still the Government would not have been injured. But I do not believe in the proposition to bring the interest on the deposits to a uniform standard throughout the country and to have that standard measured by the willingness of certain banks in certain States to pay a specific rate of interest.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, there is no disposition, I think, on the part of anyone to bring about an unseemly competition among banks in bidding for this money. The board of trustees will certainly not be unmindful of the fact that this institution is being created not for profit, but for the public welfare. In order that the postal depository may recoup for losses sustained, it must have the power to increase the rates of interest charged for the use of the money. The rate fixed to be paid to the citizen is arbitrary. Two per cent must be paid, and out of the funds deposited the trustees must make an amount equal to the 2 per cent plus the cost of operation.

In Great Britain some instructive figures are furnished with reference to this matter. For instance, a continual loss of profits accrued, according to the table before me, from 1876 to the year 1895. In 1896 losses; that is, the amount of the expense to the Government exceeded the receipts by £6,162, and this continued down until 1899. Then a profit set in in 1900, 1901, and 1902.

Again, in 1903, a loss of £107,403 was incurred, and this continued without abatement or change, except some variation of amount, until 1908. The total profits accruing thus far to the Government from the operation of the savings banks of Great Britain amount to £1,665,208. The losses aggregate £709,270.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARTER. In just a moment. I wish to complete the sentence. There has been a net gain on the whole operation since 1876 of £955,938, or $4,652,072. The losses have occurred through the abnormal increase of the price of consols for one period and the subsequent drop in the market value or quotations.

Beginning about 1903 the rate of interest paid on the par value of the consol dropped down to 2½ per cent, whereas the rate paid to depositors was 2½ per cent. The loss occurred because the whole burden of operation was cast upon the treasury, the amount of interest collected being just the equivalent of the amount paid out. But the Government thought better to continue to pay the regular rate of interest out of the surplus which had accrued through the year than to decrease the rate for the time being.

This is the situation: What we desire for the United States board of trustees is the right to raise the rate of interest if the payments, to meet obligations for expenses and interest, are found to be greater than the interest charge will supply.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have seen no statement that would indicate approximately whether or not this is to be a good transaction, so far as the Government is concerned, in a financial way. I want to ask the Senator from Montana if he can state to the Senate the rate of interest that is allowed in Great Britain to the depositor and the rate that is charged to the banks or other institutions receiving this money? Is it about the same difference that is carried in the bill?

Mr. CARTER. The rate paid to the depositor in Great Britain at present—and that has been the rate for a long time—is 2½ per cent. All the funds are invested in government securities, the consols of the United Kingdom; and the consols now paying only 2½ per cent, the rate paid results in the loss to which I have referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. It fluctuates because of the fluctuation in the price of consols.

Mr. CARTER. The price of consols determines the receipts of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I am on my feet, I wish to ask the Senator if he has any objection, in line 18, page 5, to inserting before the word "rate," the word "uniform?" Is there any objection to making that change in the text of the bill, on page 5, line 18, so as to read, "That the funds shall be received at a uniform rate of interest of not less than 2½ per cent per annum?" If there is objection, I will not offer it; but it occurred to me——

Mr. BURKETT. I think that would refer only to the immediate neighborhood. I have an amendment here that I think would cover the point, and that is the reason why I have been studying it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not press it now.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask the Senator if the rate at that point in the bill does not apply to the immediate neighborhood?

Mr. GALLINGER. My purpose was to make it of general uniformity, of course.

Mr. BURKETT. I understand that the Senator wants it uniform throughout the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say, while I am on my feet, that it seemed to me if there is any doubt left in the bill as to the authority of the board to make a rate in different sections of the country, we ought to foreclose that doubt.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. BURKETT. We ought to provide, in my judgment, that the rate shall be uniform throughout the country, and as I sat here I have been thinking about it. I thought of suggesting, after the words "per annum," in line 19, to insert "and which rate shall be uniform throughout the country."

Mr. GALLINGER. I had it so written myself.

Mr. BURKETT. It had not occurred to me, I will say, in my consideration of the bill that there would be any thought anywhere that different rates of interest would be made in different States. It seems to me that there ought to be a uniform rate throughout the country. Since this question has arisen I am of the opinion that we ought certainly to put in the bill a provision that the rate shall be uniform.

I will merely suggest to the chairman that possibly we might cover the other question that has been raised by an amendment after the words "per annum." Section 8 reads:

> That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum.

We might follow that by this provision:

> Nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the country.

I am very certain of the latter part of my amendment. I am not so certain yet as to the first part of the amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I will only say that the thought expressed by the Senator from Nebraska is the one I had in mind; that is, if it is not the purpose of the Government in any sense to profit by the increase in the rate of interest, that purpose ought to be declared in the act, and the increase over what the individual depositor gets should be limited to such an amount as is necessary to reimburse for the additional expense incurred in administering the law and in making good the losses sustained.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, has it occurred to Senators that when you place the use, for a convenient expression, of $700,000,000 under the control of a board they will dictate to the entire financial world the rate of interest that they will receive on their money? The deposits in this bank, according to the statements made, will be two-thirds of the amount now deposited in national banks, of private money, and if the money can be obtained from the Government at 2¼ per cent it certainly will have a very serious effect upon the rates of interest that private individuals or business concerns may receive for their money. In other words, the Government will come into the loaning market to compete with the people who to-day furnish the money of the country.

Do you see what effect it is going to have upon incomes? Instead of 5 or 4½ or 6 per cent that may be realized to-day, with a competing market for money that has no individuality behind it, do you suppose that the incomes to-day derived from investments will maintain their status? Do you not realize that you are bringing a competitor into the market against those who live upon the income of their money that will, if not destroy it, at least reduce it to a point which will count for hundreds of millions of dollars in the incomes of the people?

Does not that phase of the case appeal to you? You are going to build up a great money-loaning institution in the country upon the minimum basis of 2¼ per cent. I merely make the suggestion at this time, and I shall probably develop it a little later on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, at the end of line 12, it is proposed to insert:

> Provided, That money deposited in banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed from time to time by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2¼ per cent per annum.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, is it possible that a bank whose right to use the money was limited to the neighborhood would pay any interest on it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. Is it possible that a bank that could look nowhere beyond the local community for the use of its money would receive it at any rate of interest? I should like to know what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] thinks of that proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will simply say to the Senator from Idaho that many of the banks in the West do pay interest on their deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. But with the privilege of using their money wherever they can find a market for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, this bill does not prevent any bank from using the money anywhere on earth.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the amendment be again reported. I think the amendment does.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has mistaken the language of the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us hear it read. I am mistaken sometimes; and we shall see whether I am now mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The Secretary again read Mr. SMOOT's amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. It shall not be withdrawn by the Government except for the limited purpose, under the limited conditions——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is where the Government is limited, not the bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have just stated——

Mr. SMOOT. No; I understood the Senator to say that we are limiting the bank as to investment.

Mr HEYBURN. What is the effect of it?

Mr. SMOOT. It is this——

Mr. HEYBURN. It shall be drawn from the bank for the limited purpose of paying depositors. If you have any adequate provision for paying—which you have not yet—it shall be withdrawn from the bank by the Government only for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so long as the money is deposited in the bank, whoever deposited it should have at least a right to withdraw it.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is as yet no provision in this bill giving him any such right.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; I think there is such a provision, and I think it is a very broad provision, because it confers upon the board of trustees almost unlimited power.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, the power is not to the depositor, but it is to the board of trustees.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, the depositor in this case is the Government, not the man who deposits in the post-office. He draws it direct from the Government under the rules and regulations as provided to be prescribed under this bill; but this amendment does not apply to the person who makes the deposit at the post-office. It simply applies to the Government as a depositor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I understand the Senator from Utah. He says that money is deposited by the Government. I find an absence in this bill of the provision contained in the previous bill, which declared these to be public moneys. What is the character of this money? To whom does it belong when it is deposited in the banks? That is the question.

Mr. SMOOT. I should say that it was a trust fund deposited by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, then, these are public funds, are they?

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the broad sense in which the Senator would say that moneys collected for customs revenue or other taxes of any kind were public funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a trust fund, then, deposited in private banks, and it may be drawn by the Government for limited purposes? Is the use that the bank may make of it limited?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; banks can do whatever they please with it as long as they are solvent concerns.

Mr. HEYBURN. With trust funds? Was ever such a provision contained in any law on earth?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it is contained in the law and practiced in all parts of this country. Whoever heard of trust funds being deposited in a bank and held within a vault? The bank handles the money; the bank makes the loan; the bank is responsible for the return of the money; and the bank, in this case, will be responsible to the Government for the return of the money.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Utah is speaking of the practice rather than of the law—an unfortunate practice—very sharp evidence of which is forced upon us with too much frequency.

Now, Mr. President, until you define the character of this fund you can not apply the rule suggested by the Senator from Utah to it. If it is a trust fund placed there by the Government there must be some limitation which will secure the integrity of the fund. If it is public money, then it is subject to appropriation by Congress. Is it subject to appropriation by Congress? No. Congress will have no control over this fund—none whatever. They can not use it for any public purpose. If 10 per cent of $700,000,000 is in the Treasury, as is provided for by one of the sections of this bill, can Congress regulate the use of that $70,000,000? Is that public money?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think anybody has ever claimed that it is public money.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill which we dealt with at the last Congress expressly said that it should be, but this bill is silent; and silence breeds suspicion in a case of that kind when the measure comes from the same source. Why not be as candid in this bill as you were in the bill before the last Congress and define the character of this money? In that measure it is expressly provided that it shall be public money.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand, the bill a year ago, if I remember it correctly——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it before me.

Mr. SMOOT (continuing). That bill declared this money to be public money, in the sense that it should not be garnisheed. I have not read the bill for some time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will read the whole sentence:

> The postal savings-depository funds are hereby declared to be public moneys and subject to the safeguards and preferences provided by statute therefor.

What "safeguards and preferences" are established by this bill for this fund?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Idaho to continue the reading.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have read the whole sentence.

Mr. SMOOT. But not the remainder of the section.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not read the whole bill; but I read a sentence that is complete in itself.

What was the object of declaring these to be public moneys, except to stamp upon them the character that pertains to public moneys that are under the control of Congress? I understand the Senator to say that Congress will have no control over this fund, but that it will be subject to the sole administration of this board.

Mr. SMOOT. Congress, Mr. President, can change the law at any time it so desires.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know, but if we are to enact bad laws here because we may change them, we establish a very dangerous and reckless rule.

Mr. President, we are far from a safe conclusion as to the provisions which should be contained in this bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and my colleague [Mr. SMOOT] are talking about two different things.

Mr. HEYBURN. Your colleague is talking about three different things. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Idaho is evidently talking about one thing and my colleague is talking about another, as I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. Inasmuch as I had the floor, he should have confined himself to the subject that we are discussing or else have taken the floor in his own right.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My understanding is that under the former bill, from which the Senator from Idaho has quoted, these moneys, when they were deposited in the post-offices, were public moneys.

Mr. HEYBURN. They were public moneys.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were public moneys then, but when the moneys were deposited in the bank by the Government the relation, as I understand it, of debtor and creditor would be created between the banker and the depositor. They would not be trust moneys; they would not be public moneys in the sense that they could be followed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us see. We gather some wisdom from the language of this. There is no limitation as to the place.

> That postal savings-depository funds—
> No matter where they are—
> are hereby declared to be public moneys.

The postal savings-depository funds—and there is no limit as to where they may be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The moment the moneys were deposited in a bank they would become merged with the general funds of the bank. They could not be traced; they would not be a special deposit. They could not be considered as trust funds, then. They are not in any manner controlled by the Government. They become the property of the bank precisely the same as money deposited by the Senator in a private account becomes the property of the bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; here is the provision that controverts that:

> If any bank in which such funds are so deposited shall become insolvent, such funds shall be a prior lien upon its assets, and shall be first paid, to the exclusion of all other indebtedness of every kind and nature whatsoever.

What character does that stamp upon the funds?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That simply means that the Government, for its debt owed by the bank to the Government, has a prior lien upon the funds of the bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. It says "such funds shall be a prior lien." The word is "funds," not "credit;" not a prior right of recovery. Does not that stamp them with the character of a special deposit? It says:

> Such funds shall be a prior lien—
> Not "such credit."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not see how the funds could be a prior lien upon anything.

Mr. HEYBURN. Neither do I. We discussed that, but I am only comparing——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Seantor permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Government might have a prior lien for the funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is another proposition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the funds themselves could not be a lien upon anything.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is another proposition, that the Government might have a prior lien; but this does not say that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There must be some inaccuracy.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to state my purpose. I was not calling attention to these provisions because I approve of them, but I was calling attention to them in the nature of an inquiry as to why they had been abandoned.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I cheerfully answer that inquiry by stating that I reached the conclusion that it was not in the power of Congress to create any such lien as that contemplated by the provision the Senator has just read; that the Government would be a mere depositor, and one depositor could not, certainly as to a state bank, create a prior lien on the resources made up in part of the deposits of other people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, that a deposit of money by the Government would simply create the relation of debtor and creditor between the bank and the Government, precisely the same as if a private individual had made the deposit.

Mr. CARTER. I answer that a lien could not be created by Congress. It was futile to attempt it, and we therefore eliminated that feature.

Mr. HEYBURN. I not only contended then, but I contend now, that it is not within the power of Congress to say that these funds, which are deposited in banks as other deposits are, might be exempted from the operation of the laws of preference and of the attachment and execution laws of a State. The Senator is right in saying that it can not be done. I am simply comparing the wisdom of that hour with the wisdom of this hour, in order that we may draw obvious conclusions.

Mr. CARTER. Very greatly to the credit of the Senator's judgment, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which is in the inconvenient position of not being printed, necessitates the carrying of its wording in mind when discussing it. The Senator takes a part of the suggestion I made with reference to these moneys and undertakes to base an argument upon it. I was discussing the relation of that money to the Government and to the depositor and the right of the use of that money by those parties. You have to discuss it from the dual standpoint. I commenced the consideration of it by calling attention to the fact that this would create a new reservoir from which to draw funds to meet loans for the necessities of business, and I rose to call attention to the results that that would have upon the money market of the world; and the money market of the world, when I discuss it, does not relate solely to the speculators, but it relates to those who find a market for their earnings and savings or accumulated wealth and live upon the interest that they may derive from it.

The price of money is regulated by its volume, its accessibility, and the convenience of obtaining it, and I am surprised that those who have in their hearts the welfare of the invested funds of this country that represent the estates of the helpless, the accumulation that stands to the credit of the children, should so far forget the duty that rests upon us as to disturb it, either as to its safety or as to its earning capacity.

They come in here with a bill that might be denominated "An act to provide a collection agency for the banks in order that the people who, in the the imagination of those who are favoring this measure, are incapable of taking care of their money, may be protected." They have shown themselves capable of accumulating it. They must be capable of accumulating it before they can deposit it, and yet they are held up here as objects of pity because they are not capable of investing or depositing their own money. I think there is no more firmly demonstrated capacity to take care of money anywhere than that shown by the very people out of whose hands you are seeking to take it. You are planning to take out of the hands of a community that has accumulated hundreds of millions of dollars the custody of it, under the pretense that you are going to make it more useful to them. You certainly are not going to make it more convenient to them, because you have provided no means on earth by which they can regain it within any reasonable bounds.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho has used several times the word "take." The word, as he uses it, implies that the Government proposes to forcibly take——

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS (continuing). From these people a certain part of their earnings.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; Mr. President, I can not yield to a criticism——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure the Senator does not intend to create any such impression, but I hope he will remember that this is simply an opportunity given to the people, which they can embrace or not as they see fit, and if they are the intelligent men and women whom we know them to be they will not give the Government their money unless they believe it is for their interest to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator has placed a limited meaning upon the word "take." The word "take" does not necessarily imply a forcible taking. We take things in the ordinary course of business with no element or suggestion of force behind it. I did not use the word in the sense of forcibly taking, and I think the Senator will understand now, if he did not before, that I did not so use it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I understood the Senator; but I am sure that the word as he used it in connection with the argument concerning it, would lead to but one conclusion, and that is that the Government was attempting to compel somebody to give it their money for safe-keeping.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; Mr. President, I do not think the Senator understood me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not——

Mr. HEYBURN (continuing). To mean that; and I doubt if anyone else would. But they are proposing by this bill—and I will use another term—to inveigle the people into placing their money in the hands of the Government for safe-keeping and interest bearing under conditions which will confront them with a very serious feature when they come to get it back. Suppose, as has been suggested, that the account must be viséed and verified at Washington, just think where the depositor in Alaska or Porto Rico would stand when he wanted to draw his money. There is no separate provision for those people. Are they to apply to the local post-offices for permission to withdraw their money and to have that application sent to Washington to be authorized?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator realizes that every savings bank in the country reserves unto itself the right to have from thirty to ninety days after demand, for payment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, every stocking or tin can in the country does not. [Laughter.] And that is where you are supposed to draw this money from.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, we have, we think, a better thing than the stocking or a tin can, and therefore——

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it proposed, Mr. President, that you are going to draw these funds from savings banks?

Mr. CARTER. Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, then, why put that argument forth at all?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator's argument proceeded to illustrate, if you please, the great hardships imposed upon a depositor in the post-office by requiring him to file an application for repayment and wait a week or ten days for his money——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; or three months.

Mr. CARTER. We propose to pay on demand, and I cite the fact that every depositor in every savings bank in the country is constantly faced with the rule of the bank which enables that institution to exact from thirty to sixty days' notice before paying one farthing.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, is it suggested by the Senator from Montana that such rules and regulations will be made relative to withdrawing the deposits from these banks?

Mr. CARTER. This bill provides that these funds shall be repayable to depositors on demand, subject to the rules and regulations prescribed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us see about that.

Mr. CARTER. Section 7 is the one that applies to this case.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will read it:

SEC. 7. That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest—

It does not say "on demand"— after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe.

Who will be the members of that board?

Mr. CARTER. The officers known as the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General.

Mr. HEYBURN. But what are the names of those gentlemen?

Mr. CARTER. The names are well known at the present time.

Mr. HEYBURN. What will their names be five years hence?

Mr. CARTER. They will be honorable men, thoroughly capable for the respective positions, regardless of the party that may be in power.

Mr. HEYBURN. Better capable of making laws than the Congress of the United States?

Mr. CARTER. Better capable of judging of conditions that may exist then than is Congress, that has no knowledge of the various details to be dealt with.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to call the attention of the Senator, who wants to incorporate all these rules and regulations into an act of Congress, to the fact that this book [exhibiting], embracing rules and regulations, is called "Staff instructions for the guidance of officials in the savings banks of Victoria."

Mr. HEYBURN. Is that entire book devoted to that subject?

Mr. CARTER. This entire book.

Mr. HEYBURN. How much did that book cost?

Mr. CARTER. It cost me nothing, I will say to the Senator. I do not assume ownership of it, however. Just what price may be paid for it by the officials who are in charge of the administration of the law there I am unable to say; but I presume the books are sent out as our public documents are to public officials for their instruction.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator to say if there is an indication of the price of the book in the title-page or elsewhere?

Mr. CARTER. I do not observe any statement as to that, nor have I seen the book advertised for sale. I assume it is a public document. It is—

Issued under the authority of George E. Emery, inspector-general of savings banks in Victoria, and in conformity with sections 2 and 9 of General Order No. 26 of the commissioners of savings banks, together with the savings banks acts of Parliament and general orders.

The book is published in Melbourne by McCarron, Bird & Co., 479 Collins street. In the table of contents the first chapter relates to "I, cash and cashbooks; II, signatures and new accounts; III, deposits and repayments; IV, checks, orders, and so forth; V, garnishee orders;" and so on throughout an extensive table of contents dealing with every phase of the administrative work. We can not put a volume as large as that into an act of Congress, and therefore we propose to commission the board which will have charge of the work of administration to prescribe the needful rules and regulations under authority of law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, there is a volume before our eyes—and I will ask the Senator the courtesy of letting me look at it for a moment—that is supposed to contain the law corresponding with what is not in this bill. It covers 398 pages of a book. I suppose in order that a depositor should know what his rights were he would want to possess a copy of this or a similar book in order that he might know just exactly how he was to deposit and how he was to withdraw his money. I think it is estimated that there will be about 7,000,000 postal savings depositors.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. More than that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Say 7,000,000 depositors. This book sells at something like $3, I am informed.

Mr. CARTER. By whom?

Mr. HEYBURN. Where you buy it. [Laughter.] I do not mean it would cost that to the Senator from Montana, but to the poor depositor who would need it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I guess that would be quite an item in making up the affairs of the Government. Would the Senator propose that the Government should furnish each depositor with one of these books?

Mr. CARTER. Of course the Senator will be better informed after he has read the title-page of that book. The book embodies instructions for the officers charged with the execution of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but the man who is to be executed under the law will want to know something about it, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Undoubtedly. We have in circulation a very interesting volume, about four times as large as that and containing about ten times as much matter, known as the "Postal Guide." Does the Senator understand that everybody who mails a letter in this country must have a copy of that book?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will just refer that question to the Senator from Montana and ask him to report upon its wisdom and its application to the matter under consideration.

Mr. CARTER. I report now. It is just as wise as the assumption of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I will refrain from indulging in anything like banter or recrimination in this matter. I find that this is the equivalent of that which this bill contemplates—the rules and regulations under which the money of the people may be deposited and withdrawn from this institution.

Mr. President, does not that point the absurdity of leaving unwritten in the law that which some private publisher must of necessity furnish to the people in order that they may know the law? Seven million books—well, if it was a million or a half a million books—is the burden that we are to shift to the people to pay for a knowledge of the rules and regulations that stand with them for the law which it is our duty to enact.

Are we incapable of legislation? Have we no time for legislation? Are our energies so sapped and depreciated that we can not bring them to bear upon the performance of our sworn duty, and that we have to refer that duty to an indefinite board and enact a law upon the faith and supposition that this board will furnish the people with some such publication as that? I am not more industrious than another member of this body, but I feel that I have the time, and I know that the duty rests upon me, to exercise the lawmaking power and functions here in this Chamber.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Idaho might carry this matter far enough to be almost ridiculous if he is going to insist upon Congress, whenever it creates any such institution as this, going into all the details of making regulations. We never have done that with respect to any institution we have heretofore created. We created the whole rural free-delivery system in a very few lines, if I remember correctly, originating in an appropriation bill. We created the whole Department of Commerce and Labor by a bill containing not as many words as this, and I suspect that every one of the great departments has been similarly created. I have not read all of the bills, although I have read some of them. If the Senator will go through that book he will find it supplies the details, in the main, of carrying out the general proposition for which legislation is enacted.

The Senator has just called attention to the time of payment. Take it in Great Britain. I remember in their regulations it runs from three to twelve days, depending upon the particular portion of the country whence the depositor may call for his money. Then, again, there is a special provision as to certain amounts under certain conditions. The money can be even paid by telegraph.

Those are things with respect to which we can not legislate. Those are details for which we can not legislate. There must be rules and regulations putting into operation this postal system.

In the more remote portions of the country, if there is only one central paying place, the depositor could not expect to get his money as quickly as at some places closer to the central paying place; and on the other hand, it may seem advisable, with our great extent of territory and in view of the fact that this is made to include Alaska, to have different zones in which the money can be paid. That certainly should be a matter of regulation. The time of payment must be worked out by some one who can give time and attention to the details and to time tables and the necessary time required. It is not a thing we can do. It is not a matter of legitimate legislation. It is a matter of detail for carrying into effect this legislation.

Now, there may be certain things which have been omitted. If there are such, the Senator or anybody else can suggest them—any principle of law. But it does seem to me if the Senator goes to the limit, as he has been going here, it would make the law ridiculous to attempt to incorporate them in the bill, and it is almost ridiculous to contend for a law as extensive as such a law would be. I undertake to say now that the Senator himself could not go into those details.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator has developed his criticism all right. But, unfortunately, it has no application to that for which I was contending. Would the Senator think it would be sufficient for us to simply enact:

It is hereby enacted that a board of three, consisting of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General, shall have authority to establish and make rules and regulations for the establishment and conducting of the business of postal savings banks, this act to take effect ten days hence.

Mr. BURKETT. We have not done that. There is not any occasion for such a question, because that is not what is done.

Mr. CARTER. Three months.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is exactly the principle upon which we are proceeding in this bill.

My attention is called to an inscription in this book:

These general instructions are to be regarded by officers as strictly confidential, and care is to be exercised to prevent them from being read by persons outside the service.

You do not know what is going to hit you or exactly where it is going to hit you. There are some men who know. Does it not seem ridiculous that we should be aping that class of government and legislation? Is it consistent with the method and the purpose of our Government—holding up Great Britain and France and Germany; not Germany, probably Kamchatka, for all I know. We are going into strange climes for wisdom. There is enough at home. Has not this legislative body, the people's Congress, sufficient ability? The people ought to inquire; and if they find that they have not gathered together a body of men capable of legislating, or as capable as these Cabinet officers, they had better have an election.

This book is brought in here to demonstrate the wisdom of this proposed policy, and we find that it consists of instructions of a confidential nature that are not to be disclosed to the beneficiaries of the legislation at all. They are not to know what the law is. It is not to be written upon the high pillars.

I will read the second paragraph:

When an officer retires from the bank this book is to be returned to me.

GEORGE E. EMERY, Inspector-General.

That is the kind of rules and regulations. Are you going to adopt them, on that plan of secrecy—that this board shall stand behind a screen, and the people may not approach or peep around it?

Mr. CARTER. The national banking act has been suggested to me as a fair illustration. That act consists of a very few sections. The language is terse. It has been amended but little. And yet the Comptroller of the Currency, a bureau chief in the Treasury Department, is vested with the power to issue all needful rules and regulations, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the guidance of all officials having to do with the inspection and conduct of every national bank in this country. That officer may to-night close any bank in the city of Washington or in any other city in this country——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER (continuing). And put in a receiver to-morrow morning.

Mr. HEYBURN. Or open it with a jimmy.

Mr. CARTER. The jimmy method belongs to another class.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not what he can do; it is what he can do under the law. The Senator speaks of every bank in this city. Are they subject to be closed under the law?

Mr. CARTER. The rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, voluminous in character and relating to very numerous details, are not made public, and it would be contrary to the public interest to make them public. Those rules and regulations to which the Senator refers are directed to the administrative officers who are guarding and protecting money from the jimmy man, to whom the Senator refers, and people of his kind, and of course they are not for uniform publication, because if the man with the jimmy is put onto the job he will quickly evade the rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know what the Senator from Montana meant, then, by bringing this book in and holding it up as an answer to my inquiry as to the volume and character of these rules and regulations made for the depositor. Why did the Senator bring this book in as an answer to that inquiry? [A pause.] Does the Senator want to answer that?

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly, Mr. President. That book illustrates the vast number of details which will have to be prepared for the guidance of persons charged with the administration of this law. The law itself constitutes ample notice to the depositor, together with such terms as may be fixed in simple rules, everywhere easily understood, as to the time required and the manner of withdrawing deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I will demonstrate an easy way of withdrawing something. I will ask the Senator to withdraw this book which he says has no application at all to the depositor.

Mr. CARTER. I am very glad to get the book back. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. HEYBURN). Ask him where he got it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I will not ask him where he got it. [Laughter.]

Now, where does this bill stand? I ask, again, Where are the rules and regulations, or where is there an instance of rules and regulations that affect the depositor and prescribe the terms upon which he may withdraw or deposit his funds? And that book will not answer it.

Mr. CARTER. For the information of the Senator from Idaho and other Senators who may desire to be informed, I am having compiled the rules and regulations affecting depositors in all the countries where postal savings banks are in operation, and I hope to have this compilation ready to submit to the Senate, to be printed as a document, to-morrow. I think it will be instructive and will in some manner indicate the general class of rules and regulations which this board will be called upon to promulgate, and, perchance, to modify from time to time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only desire to say now, in response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana with reference to national banks, that there is not a note issued which is not provided for by law; there is not a note issued pursuant to a rule or regulation of anybody; and there is not a note redeemed by the Government except pursuant to express statute.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 3, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Rev. John Van Schaick, jr.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 365.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department is hereby authorized during the Sixty-first Congress to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the resolution is agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

S. 5236. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had, on January 31, 1910, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 14579. An act to amend section 12 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to purchasers of Indian lands under any law now existing or hereafter enacted, and for other purposes," approved May 29, 1908, and for other purposes.

COMPENSATION OF STOREKEEPERS AND GAUGERS.

The SPEAKER. This being calendar Wednesday, the Clerk will report the title of the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 18813) to amend section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANGLEY. As I recall it, the House was dividing upon the passage of the bill just reported as unfinished business when the point that no quorum was present was made, and thereupon the House decided to adjourn. The parliamentary question I submit now is whether debate on this bill is still in order.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that on calendar Wednesday a week ago the House was dividing, not by roll call, but while it was dividing so many in the affirmative and so many in the negative, the point of no quorum was made, and a quorum not being present, the House adjourned.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair reads from the Digest:

After the Speaker has put the affirmative part of the question any Member who has not spoken before to the question may rise and speak before the negative be put, because it is no full question till the negative part be put.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I was just trying to understand what the parliamentary inquiry was. The Chair states the facts just as they were. I made the point of no quorum myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I make this suggestion?

The SPEAKER. One moment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if it will aid in the solution of the difficulty, I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Unfortunately this is Wednesday, February, and that was Wednesday, January, so that the Chair fails to see that a nunc pro tunc order can be entered.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not see myself, but I did not wish to be in the way of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I make this suggestion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The previous question was not ordered on this bill, having been a report from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. While the affirmative of the question was put on last Wednesday and the negative of the question was put on last Wednesday, it will be necessary in any event to put the affirmative on the question again to-day if the bill proceeds to a vote. And under the rule, as I understand it, even after the affirmative should be put to-day, it would be in order for any gentleman to rise and ask to be recognized in debate. What took place the other day, so far as the vote is concerned, is wiped out by the fact that there was no quorum present; and hence that point being raised it was not within the power of the House to vote, and all of those proceedings must necessarily be gone over again. The previous question not having been ordered on the bill, it seems to me that up to the time that the negative of the vote is ordered to-day it is in order to address the Chair and receive recognition in debate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there anybody that wants to make another speech about this business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes that there is. He is not informed, but the question was asked, and there probably will be.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], I desire to state that I understand that some of the gentlemen who opposed this bill the other day are not now opposed to it. If that is the situation, I do not desire to be heard upon the question; otherwise, I shall desire to be heard.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit me, I will say that on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] all debate would close upon this bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. That was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Speaker. That was before the bill was reported to the House.

Mr. MACON. Yes; that was done in Committee of the Whole. This was in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again read from the Digest, on page 237, as follows:

> After the Speaker has put the affirmative part of the question, any Member who has not spoken before to the question can rise and speak before the negative be put—

That is, where the previous question has not been ordered—> because it is no full question until the negative part be put.

Now, the affirmative was put and the negative was put, but upon the negative being put immediately the point of no quorum was made, and it was ascertained that no quorum was present. A quorum is absolutely necessary for the transaction of business. The Chair would be inclined to hold that everything that transpired in the House when no quorum was present would be void. The point of no quorum was not put when those who were in the affirmative voted, but it was put immediately when those who were in the negative voted, and it was ascertained that no quorum was present. There being no quorum present when the negative vote was put, it occurs to the Chair that the whole matter is void so far under the rule. Therefore the Chair, within the language, would say that debate is in order, because "any Member who has not spoken before to the question may arise and speak before the negative be put." The negative was put, but immediately it was disclosed that there was no quorum, and the putting of the negative to less than a quorum, it seems to the Chair, is void.

Mr. DOUGLAS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. How far back does that presumption go? There were 50 men who left the House after the negative was put and those in favor of the negative——

The SPEAKER. There was a quorum present so far as the Journal discloses up to the time that the negative was put. Then it was immediately disclosed for the first time that there was no quorum, and therefore it occurs to the Chair that the House had no power to transact business.

Mr. SHERLEY. Admitting that the Chair is right as to the point of no quorum being made when the call for nays was had, of necessity does not the fact that no quorum was present go back, not simply to the time when the vote was on the negative of the proposition, but also to the time when the vote was had on the affirmative of the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed from the Journal whether there was a quorum present when the affirmative was put or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. The way the point of no quorum is raised is after the negative vote has been taken, carrying that vote with the affirmative vote for the purpose of ascertaining whether the two together constitute a quorum. Does the Chair hold that after the counting of both the affirmative and negative vote the matter is open for debate, without regard to whether a man wants to speak on one side or the other?

The SPEAKER. The point was made when the negative vote was taken. Perchance there may have been a quorum—and the Chair is presuming from the Journal there was a quorum—when the affirmative was put; but when the negative was put there was no quorum; and therefore it appears that——

Mr. SHERLEY. Do I understand the Chair rules that debate shall be had only by those who have not spoken on the bill or that the matter is open to the same consideration as if no vote had been taken at all?

The SPEAKER. Well, acting on the letter of the rule and the Manual, the Chair would say that when the affirmative was put there was a quorum and when the negative was put there was no quorum; and it seems to the Chair, from the Journal, that the negative would have to be put again; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman who desires to talk.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am very earnestly in favor of this measure, and there are several things that I would like to say in its support. But what I desire is results rather than an opportunity to make a speech. There are now upon the floor a great many gentlemen who were not here when the measure was debated one week ago. There were several assertions made in that debate which I should like to answer now if the House were not impatient to proceed with other business, and particularly the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department had departed from its proper jurisdiction in reporting a bill the effect of which was to increase the expenditures of the Government. I thought at the time that these gentlemen were possibly correct, knowing, as I did, their reputation as parliamentarians and their familiarity with the rules of the House; but I have since found, upon investigation, that one of the very purposes for which these committees were created was, to quote the language of the original rule, adopted in 1817—

> Also to examine into the pay and emoluments of all officers under the laws of the United States, and to report from time to time such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require.

This bill is a typical case for the exercise of that jurisdiction. It merely proposes to follow out the recommendations of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue and several of his predecessors, to pay the salary and expenses of these employees in traveling to and from their assignments.

The impression was made the other day that this bill applies to only one section of the country. That is entirely erroneous. It applies to all the employees of that service I am informed by a number of gentlemen around me that they are ready to vote on the question, and I am convinced, from what they say to me now, that there is no longer any serious objection to the bill. If no other gentleman desires to address the House upon the question, and apparently none do, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman does that, I would like to have a couple of minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly; but I do not want to lose the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor; he can yield such time as he may desire.

Mr. LANGLEY. To accommodate the gentleman, then, I withdraw, for the moment, the motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not moved the previous question. He can make that motion when he desires. The gentleman is recognized for debate. Does he yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LANGLEY. With the understanding that I retain the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which was before the House the other day in Committee of the Whole. At that time it did not meet with great favor in the House. This is the result of the activity of one of the expenditure committees, and I compliment the committee on some activity. However, it seems that the first result of the activity of the committee, designed to reduce expenditures, is to recommend the passage of a bill to increase the expenditures of the Government. This bill is a proposition to increase the compensation of gaugers.

It does not seem to me to appeal to the House. There have been similar bills pending before the Committee on Ways and Means for years, which have never received favorable consideration by the committee in the main charged with the duties with reference to such matters. But the moment that the committee on expenditures—to reduce expenditures in the Treasury Department—gets possession of this bill to increase the compensation of gaugers and to increase the expenditures, it is brought into the House, and they undertake to pass it. If we pass this bill, every expenditure committee in the House will be busy reporting bills to increase the compensation of the various officials of the Government.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as well as I could understand the gentleman from Illinois in the confusion that is going on upon the floor, he contends that the business of these committees on expenditures is to reduce expenditures.

As I said a moment ago, I have had occasion to look up the history of this question, and I find that under the rules adopted nearly one hundred years ago one of the duties of these committees was to report, from time to time, such a reduction or increase of expenditures as a just economy and the public service may require. And the present rule, defining their jurisdiction, which was adopted in the Forty-sixth Congress, contains substantially the same provision.

Now, the Speaker did me the honor to place me on one of these committees. I was not particularly pleased with that assignment at the time, but since I have read up the history of these commitees and have realized the importance of their jurisdiction, I desire to return my thanks to the Speaker for having placed me upon such an important committee. There are 70 Members of this House on these various committees on expenditures, and I hope to see the same activity on the part of the balance of them that this committee is showing. I insist that it is misleading to assert that this committee has reported to the House a bill that is not within the province of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I have not made any such charge. They have not reported any bill to reduce any expenditures, though.

Mr. LANGLEY. I understood that to be the purport of the gentleman's argument the other day, at least. If these committees have not reported more bills it is the fault of other committees of the House that have purloined our jurisdiction in matters of this kind.

In reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this bill proposes an increase in expenditures, let me say that it involves a total increase of only a few thousand dollars, according to the estimate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; not an increase in the salary of anyone, but rather in doing what is done in the cases of other field employees of the Government; that is, to pay the salary and expenses of these revenue employees in traveling to and from the place of assignment, just the same as they are now paid when traveling from one assignment to another under transfer.

I shall not undertake any general discussion of the question as to how important this is to the Revenue Service, because the views of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue covering that point were read to the House when this matter was up for discussion a week ago, and gentlemen who were not present then have doubtless read it in the RECORD. It is, in my judgment, a very important matter, even if it does involve an expenditure of only a few thousand dollars. As the officers of the Treasury Department have reported, it will result in saving revenue amounting to many times as much as the slight increase in expenditures involved. Moreover, it will be simply an act of justice toward these revenue men, who are the most overworked and underpaid set of men in the government service to-day. I wish it were possible to do more for them now, in the way of increasing their emoluments, than this bill proposes to do.

I do not desire to detain the House on this question, but my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has requested me to yield three minutes to him, which I now do.

Mr. SHERLEY. So far as the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] went as a criticism of these committees for not being more active in proposing reforms, I am in accord with him; but I suggest to him and to the House that the fate of this bill should not be determined by the activity or lack of activity of the committees on expenditures, but that it ought to be determined by the question whether the particular change recommended here is warranted by the facts.

I have spoken here from time to time in regard to the desirability of lessening expenditures; but you are not going to reduce expenditures very much in these matters when you increase your expenditures by millions of dollars in other matters. I was very glad to second the gentleman from Illinois in attempting to do away with a proposition to expend over a million dollars for a national encampment of the militia that I felt could be dispensed with at this particular time, and we found very little support. It is in things of that sort that you may reduce your annual budget, and not in denying legitimate and proper compensation to these men. A gentleman asked me privately if there were any of these gaugers in my district. I said: "Yes; there are quite a number; all Republicans." So that, speaking from a strictly personal point of view, it would not be of any special interest to me to promote the welfare of these men, as they have not shown any activity in regard to mine; but I do believe, on the merits of it, that these men are entitled to their traveling expenses, which the present law does not give them, and I believe the House can afford to pass this bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is clearly within the proper province of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department to report or recommend legislation to equalize expenditures and salaries in that department. Therefore it seems to me that this committee has legal jurisdiction over the bill that is now before the House for consideration. This proposed legislation is certainly entitled to the consideration of the House.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOP. On that subject of jurisdiction I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the rule, page 349, that gives the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department jurisdiction of this matter. It is in paragraph 42 and in paragraph 44 where it is expressly given.

Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. That is the rule I was referring to, and a rule with which Members of the House are more or less familiar. This bill simply seeks, as I understand it, to pay the expenses of a government employee when going to or from the place of assignment. This class of employees only get $2 a day for doing practically the same work that the men who are on the eligible list under the civil-service rules get $4 a day for, and during the past policy and under the present law they must make the trip to and from the place of assignment at their own expense.

Mr. LANGLEY. And not only that, but they must remain there without compensation until the distillery starts up and begins to work.

Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky. Yes; I know of my own personal knowledge of cases where the man had been assigned to a small distillery at a compensation of $2 a day and paid his own traveling expenses, amounting to $5 or $10; and then when he got there found that the water supply had given out, or something was wrong, and they decided not to start up, and the man had to return home. I submit to the membership of this House that it is not a question of extravagance, it is not a matter of increased salaries, but it is a matter of justice and equalization. This bill does not go quite as far as I would have it. It should increase the salaries of this class of employees as well as to reimburse them for their expenses. However, I think the House understands the question sufficiently to vote favorably upon it and that further debate is not necessary.

Mr. LANGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, if no one desires to address the House, I move the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LANGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REPEALING PORTION OF SECTION 429, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. BOUTELL (when the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department was called). Mr. Speaker, by unanimous vote of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department I call up the bill (H. R. 18403) to repeal a portion of section 429 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second clause of section 429 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, there was so much confusion in the House that I could not hear what the bill was about.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Illinois favor us with some information as to what the section is about?

Mr. BOUTELL. The bill is a bill to repeal an almost forgotten clause in a statute passed in 1843, requiring the Secretary of the Navy to annually print all contracts and bids received by that department, whether accepted or rejected, and under that law the Secretary has gone on all these years printing these statements until this unnecessary printing bill now amounts to several thousand dollars a year, and this bill will make an annual saving to the Government by doing away with this unnecessary printing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask the gentleman why he calls it unnecessary printing; isn't it just as well that the public should know what the bids are and what was accepted?

Mr. BOUTELL. That would be disclosed by a reading of the report which will come while the bill is under consideration. All of these matters are made public, as will appear when the report is read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, the reasons for the passage of this bill are set forth in the report, and I ask that the report may be read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report by Mr. BOUTELL, as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18403) entitled "A bill to repeal a portion of section 429 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," reports it favorably and recommends that the same do pass.

Section 429 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

"SEC. 429. The Secretary of the Navy shall make annual reports to Congress upon the following subjects:

* * * * * * *

"Second. A statement of all offers for contracts for supplies and services made during the preceding year, by classes, indicating such as have been accepted."

* * * * * * *

Under the provisions of this law the annual reports of the Secretary of the Navy must contain a detailed statement of all bids received by the department, whether rejected or accepted. It has been the practice of the Paymaster-General to furnish this detailed statement in his report to the Secretary.

The compilation and printing of these bids, as required by the second clause of this section, the committee believes involves an unnecessary expenditure, inasmuch as the publicity—which was originally, in 1843, when this clause was enacted, intended to be provided—is now secured by the fact that all bids for supplies are opened at an advertised time and place; that they are always on file and open to inspection by anyone interested; that they are published by a private journal devoted to that purpose; and that they are, under other provisions of law (secs. 3744, 3745, 3746, 3747, Rev. Stat.), furnished to the returns office in the Interior Department, where copies may be obtained by whomsoever may desire such information.

It is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy in his report for 1908, on page 24, under the head of "Unnecessary printing," and by the Paymaster-General in the same report, on page 726, under the head of "Annual schedule of proposals," as follows:

UNNECESSARY PRINTING.

"Wherever such action can be taken without prejudice to the public interests, the great expense involved in the printing of official reports, particularly when made in tabulated form, should be cut down. In certain cases this printing is required by ancient statutes for some object not now apparent, and the expense is continued merely because it is required by law. A striking example of this is afforded by the provisions of section 429 of the Revised Statutes, under which the annual report of the Paymaster-General of the Navy must contain a schedule of all bids received by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, 'indicating such as have been accepted.' This statute dates back to March 3, 1843, and at the time of its passage and for many years thereafter its observance would not necessarily have involved great expense. The business of the navy has, however, so grown that at present the printing of this information in the form required occupied last year 324 pages, enumerating 40,000 bids received by the bureau, at a very considerable cost for printing alone, not to mention the time lost in preparation of the necessary data. All bids for supplies are opened publicly at an advertised time and place; they are always on file and open to the inspection of anyone interested; are published in detail in a private journal devoted to that purpose, and, furthermore, are under other provisions of law furnished to the returns office, where copies may be obtained by whomsoever may desire such information.

"The annual publication in the report of the Paymaster-General of this information in detail seems, therefore, to be wholly unnecessary.

ANNUAL SCHEDULE OF PROPOSALS.

"Under the provisions of section 429, Revised Statutes, the annual report of the Paymaster-General must contain a schedule of all bids received by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, 'indicating such as have been accepted.' This law dates back to March 3, 1843, and it would seem as if the time had come to put a stop to such a useless and expensive waste.

"The report of 1907, which was typical of its predecessors, contained 372 pages, 324 of which were devoted to enumerating the 40,000 bids received by the bureau at a cost for printing alone of $1,375, not to mention the valuable time lost in its preparation. All bids for supplies are opened publicly at an advertised time and place. They are always on file and free to the inspection of anyone interested, and are published in detail in a private journal devoted to that purpose. It is recommended, therefore, that Congress be asked to repeal this obsolete law."

The bill was referred to the Secretary of the Navy and the appended letter is his recommendation for the repeal of this clause.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 22, 1910.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 19th instant, inclosing copy of a bill (H. R. 18403) "to repeal a portion of section 429 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," and requesting that the measure be examined and a report made to you thereon.

In reply I have the honor to inform you that this statute dates back to the year 1843, at which time compliance with its terms obviously would not have involved great expense. The navy, however, has grown to proportions which could scarcely have been contemplated at the time of its enactment, and the business of handling bids has correspondingly increased.

It may be remarked that the publicity which was originally intended to be provided is now secured by the fact that all bids for supplies are opened publicly at an advertised time and place; that they are always on file and open to inspection by anyone interested; that they are published by a private journal devoted to that purpose; and that, furthermore, they are, under other provisions of law, furnished to the returns office, where copies may be obtained by whomsoever may desire such information.

Besides, it is estimated that a considerable sum in each year might be saved by the repeal of the part of section 429 in question, and in view of all the foregoing facts such action is recommended.

The provision whose repeal is sought reads as follows:

"Second. A statement of all offers for contracts for supplies and service made during the preceding year, by classes, indicating such as have been accepted."

For the further information of the committee, there is inclosed a copy of the current report of the Paymaster-General, showing from page 110 to page 377 thereof, 267 pages in all, the matter that would be saved by the enactment of the proposed legislation.

Faithfully yours,

G. V. L. MEYER.

THE CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER (during the reading). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the report.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], and also in the report of the committee, it is alleged that these reports now published by the Government under authority of law are also reported and published in a private journal, and that the publication of this private journal would be all sufficient. I would like to inquire, if the authorized publication of these reports were abandoned, what reliability might be placed in this publication in a private journal? Might it not be misleading?

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that no one who is interested in these bids needs to rely upon the journal, which is called the "United States Government Advertiser," a copy of which I hold in my hand, and which is a journal about 28 years old. Anyone who is interested in the accuracy of the statements here can go to two different places to verify them. In the first place, all of these bids and offers and all the details are on file and open to inspection, as stated by the Secretary of the Navy, in the Navy Department. Also, this law of 1862, to which he refers, requires that all of these bids shall also be on file in the returns office of the Interior Department. Undoubtedly, if we could look into the minds of the legislators in 1862, when they passed this provision, we would find that they intended to repeal the old law of 1843.

Mr. BARNHART. Could the gentleman state what the cost of these publications is now to the Government?

Mr. BOUTELL. It can not be told with accuracy, but the report of the Paymaster-General for 1909 containing these printed statements occupy in very fine print pages 110 to 376, or 266 pages of fine print, which probably no mortal man ever looked at. It costs the Government in the first place from two to three thousand dollars simply to print it, and it also requires the services of clerks in tabulating and collating these matters when they might better be employed in some other work. The law is obsolete, and the work is absolutely useless in view of the compiling of the bids in the Navy Department and in the returns office.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the Joint Committee on Printing had this very proposition under investigation. In a conversation I recently had with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy he called my attention to these facts, and it was his opinion that there was ample provision for publicity of these matters outside of this statute. Now, there are other matters in this department in which we think there can be large saving made. The Navy Department seems to favor this economy, and it is our desire that every economy that is consistent with proper administration should be effected. We have their interest and cooperation, and we want it in bringing about a reform in printing in the executive departments. I hope this proposition will be received favorably by the House.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the decision of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department corroborated by the Joint Committee on Printing, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FOOD FISHES IN INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY WATERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 638), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State submitting "A system of uniform and common international regulations for the protection and preservation of the food fishes in international boundary waters of the United States and Canada," which have been "prepared by the International Fisheries Commission pursuant to and under the authority of the convention of April 11, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain."

The regulations are submitted to the Congress in order that due legislative action on the part of the Government of the United States may be taken as stipulated for in article 3 of the convention.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 2, 1910.

THIRTEENTH DECENNIAL CENSUS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call of committees.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (when the Committee on the Census was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Census, I desire to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 18364) to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved July 2, 1909, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana presents a bill, by direction of the Committee on the Census, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. Under the rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18364) to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved July 2, 1909, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the bill read, so the House can be informed as to just what it is.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. All right, then. I will ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read the substitute instead of the original bill. The committee recommends a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the substitute be read in lieu of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18364) to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved July 2, 1909.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses," approved July 2, 1909, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That the Thirteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to manufactures, and to mines and quarries. The schedules relating to population shall include for each inhabitant the name, relationship to head of family, color, sex, age, conjugal condition, place of birth, place of birth of parents, number of years in the United States, citizenship, occupation, whether or not employer or employee, and, if employee, whether or not employed at the date of enumeration and the number of months unemployed during the preceding calendar year, whether or not engaged in agriculture, school attendance, literacy, and tenure of home, and whether or not a survivor of the Union or Confederate army or navy; and the name and address of each blind or deaf and dumb person; and for the enumeration of institutions, shall include paupers, prisoners, juvenile delinquents, insane, feeble-minded, blind, deaf and dumb, and inmates of benevolent institutions.

"The schedules relating to agriculture shall include name, color, and country of birth of occupant of each farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, and character of timber thereon, value of farm and improvements, value of farm implements, number and value of live stock on farms and ranges, number and value of domestic animals not on farms and ranges, and the acreage of crops planted and to be planted during the year of enumeration, and the acreage of crops and the quantity and value of crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration.

"The schedules of inquiries relating to manufactures and to mines and quarries shall include the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, cooperative, or other form; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital actually invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners, stockholders, and officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees and the amount of their wages; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; amount of miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time in operation during the census year; character and quantity of power used, and character and number of machines employed.

"The census of manufactures and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration of population and shall be confined to mines and quarries and manufacturing establishments which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood household and hand industries: Provided, That the census shall also include an enumeration of the number of cattle, calves, sheep, lambs, hogs, goats, and kids slaughtered for food purposes, and all hides produced, whether taken from animals slaughtered for food purposes or otherwise, during the year next preceding the year of the enumeration of population, irrespective of the character of the establishment in which slaughtered or produced.

"The inquiry concerning manufactures shall cover the production of turpentine and rosin, and the report concerning this industry shall show, in addition to the other facts covered by the regular schedule of manufactures, the quantity and quality of turpentine and rosin manufactured and marketed, the sources, methods, and extent of the industry.

"Whenever he shall deem it expedient, the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees, to be employed without respect to locality.

"The form and subdivision of inquiries necessary to secure the information under the foregoing topics shall be determined by the Director of the Census."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the committee briefly upon this bill. It is not as formidable as it appears. All there is that is new is the proviso on page 4 of the bill. Under the original law, under the act providing for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, the Director of the Census is authorized to take a full and complete census of agriculture, and that includes the food animals slaughtered on the farms and the hides taken from animals on the farms. The act also authorizes or requires a census of manufactures, and that requires an investigation and the census of the food animals slaughtered in the large packing establishments; but the act provides that no census shall be taken of what is called the hand or neighborhood industries of the country, and the Director of the Census has construed that to mean the little butcher establishments, so that under the law now we are to have a census of the number of animals slaughtered in the large establishments with the number of hides produced, the number of animals slaughtered on the farms, but no account is to be taken whatever of the animals slaughtered in the thousands of country butcher shops all over the land. The amendment simply covers that gap. It provides that in addition to the census of the slaughterhouses and of the farms there shall be an account for the year 1909 of the animals slaughtered in the little butcher shops, and that is all there is to the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Is that all the change that is made in the law enacted last year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is all the change that is made, and it is contained in the proviso on page 4. We add that proviso and there is no other change in the law whatever.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This provision in italics, page 4, line 23, or rather all these italicized words, is simply a repetition of the old law, and you have simply recommended the existing law and added to it the words in reference to the taking of the census of the number of cattle, calves, sheep, lambs, hogs, goats, and so forth, irrespective of where slaughtered.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman is right about that. We propose that change because we thought it better legislation in amending the act to copy the amended section as it will be when amended, and that is the reason why the committee reported the substitute for the original bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then another question. I understand that the provision as to the appointment of these special agents by the director, and the manner in which they shall perform their duty, is not a change of the existing law, but is the law as it now exists and as already passed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is absolutely right. We made no change at all except to add the proviso on page 4.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I ask the gentleman this question: Why it was put in the original law that these statistics which we have provided for here should be collected by agents to be employed without respect to locality? Why was it necessary to put such a provision as that in he law?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I do not know. I suppose that is so agents could be sent from one place to another, experienced men, to make investigations. Then another reason is experienced men are taken in the line of manufactures from manufacturing establishments, and it is advisable, as a matter of policy, to send such men out of their own localities sometimes, away from rivals, for instance; but that was a matter that was determined when Congress passed the law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This is simply repeating what is already the law?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is already the law.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the purpose of having this census of hides?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course in taking a census of the number of animals slaughtered in the country butchering establishments it adds nothing to the expense to take a census of the hides also, because we all know that every animal that is slaughtered for food purposes has a hide; that is, most every animal. The supreme court of Indiana, I think the gentleman will remember, has said that chickens are animals, but probably it will not require a census of chicken hides.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I take it for granted that the gentleman has some other purpose than to simply know the number of animals that have been slaughtered in this country in the taking of the census of the hides.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I intended to explain that in a moment. The object is to find out the percentage, for instance, of the food animals slaughtered in the United States that are slaughtered in the large packing establishments, the percentage that are slaughtered on the farms, and the percentage that are slaughtered in the country butcher shops. The law requires us to take a census of the number of animals slaughtered in the large establishments and the number slaughtered on the farm.

How much information in the way of statistics does that convey to the country? Here are twenty-five or thirty thousand local community butchering establishments, each one of which slaughters quite a number of animals each year, and we would have no account of those at all. This is to make the statistics complete and valuable. Then deductions may be made respecting, for instance, the price of meats, based upon the percentage of the meat product that may be controlled by the large packing houses.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield, in that connection, for another question? I woud like to know whether or not the increased price of shoes and other finished leather goods has induced the gentleman to bring in this amendment to the bill, especially after hides were placed upon the free list last August in the Payne bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; not at all. If there is any argument——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am not making any argument. I wish to know if it had anything to do with this proposed amendment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If there is any inference to be drawn from the fact that after placing hides on the free list they went up in price, it is that it is a dangerous thing to reduce the tariff schedules.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am simply trying to get at the purpose of the gentleman in taking this census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The purpose of taking this census is to give statistical information upon some very vital questions; and the meat question is a vital one and the hide question is an important one. It is true, I understand, that since hides were put on the free list they have increased in price. Is it not important to know now if there are any artificial forces operating on the price of hides? Is it not important to know now what percentage of the hides produced in this country may be under the control of the large packers and what percentage may be taken from the farm and what from the country butcher shop?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I quite agree with the gentleman that it is important, with a view of seeing whether or not the meat packers or any other institution in this country are controlling the hide market, with a view of not only forcing up the price of hides, but forcing up the price of finished leather goods as well. And if that is the purpose of this, I think it is commendable.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is the purpose to furnish statistical information. The gentleman must bear in mind that the Bureau of the Census is a statistical bureau alone. It is not engaged in throttling crime——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I quite agree with the gentleman there.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Its business is not to hunt down criminals, but it is to furnish trustworthy and reliable information of the great industries of the country.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does he think if this amendment becomes a law and a complete census is taken of the hides, that that will furnish the country with the information as to whether the price of hides in this country is controlled by any combination of men?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would simply furnish such information as statistics would yield. All else is a matter of deduction and argument. It will furnish reliable statistical information. Then the gentleman, when he enters into a campaign, as he doubtless will many times in the future—I hope he will——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I desire to say again that I am heartily in favor of the gentleman's proposed amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). Can have reliable information as to what percentage of hides is under the control of the big packers, what percentage of meats is produced by the large packers, what percentage on the farm, and what in the little country butcher establishments. It will be reliable information. There need be no guesswork. Our imaginations then will perhaps not be excited by the influences connected with the campaign, and the statistics will compel us to tell the truth to the people.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, that is what we all want and what we are all supposed to do.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I had agreed to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, no doubt the gentleman from Indiana, as well as other Members of Congress, discovered last summer when we were in the tariff debate how hard it was to get any statistics on hides in these departments according to the tanners and hide dealers' classification. I got figures from the department, and I found that dry hides were taken and mixed in with green salted hides. The price of dry hides is usually double the price of green salted, weighing about 40 per cent of the green salted weight. When these are grouped together the average price is given for a number of pounds, which was practically no information to the tanner, as he did not know what per cent was dry or green; also could not tell the number of dry hides that were dutiable, and for this reason in the debate when the figures are taken and inserted in the RECORD you will see that they do not balance. I believe as long as we are keeping statistics we should keep them according to trade classification and not according to the department classification that can not be compared in any way in making an estimate or report. I believe that hides should be classified by the department, first, green cattle hides, 25 pounds and over; calfskins and kip, 25 pounds and under; horsehides; dry hides, 10 pounds and over; dry calfskins, 10 pounds and under; goatskins and all other kinds—this would cover hides from all animals not classified above.

I have introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be compelled to compile and publish a monthly statement showing the imports and exports on the following classification of tanned leather:

1. Sole leather.
2. Harness, skirting, and strap leather.
3. Belt leather.
4. Upper leather made of cattle hides.
5. Upper leather made of calfskins.
6. Upper leather made of goatskins.
7. Upper leather made of sheepskins.
8. Automobile and furniture leather.

Now, I believe this bill should have the support of every Member of Congress, as well as the people of the United States, so that we can get a trade classification that everybody can understand, not alone of what we import but what we produce at home.

In answer to the gentleman's question about the price of hides and shoes, I wish to state that buff hides have gone up 400 per cent from the lowest prices that we had some years ago, and shoes have only advanced about 10 to 40 per cent; and I for one resent the insinuation of the trust-paid lobbyists who come here and who try to defend the packer trust as against the tanning and shoe industries of this country.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to this bill, and I only want to ask a question or two. I do not think we are dealing with a question of the tariff now. We have had our say about it. It is a matter on which many of us have different opinions. This is not a question of tariff upon cattle hides, but a question of the tariff on cattle hides that affect the price of beef. The important question is this: Whether in the proposed amendment to the census act we will take a census that will show all of the cattle killed upon the farms for farm-home consumption, or whether it is not by the language and by the interpretation construed merely to hides of cattle killed by the packers and by the small butchers?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no; the agricultural provision requires a complete census of all agricultural products, and that means, of course, everything that is produced on the farm.

Mr. KEIFER. But that is not an answer, I believe, to my question. That is all true; but when we are taking a census to get such statistics as will show the number of hides taken from food animals under the provisions of the bill, does it include hides taken from food animals raised perhaps by the farmer and killed for his own use at home?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, now, all I wish to say is that the Director of the Census, in a letter in reference to the advisability of this bill, said that he had ample authority to collect all information respecting animals killed on the farm and in large slaughtering concerns, but a provision in the law excluding household and neighborhood industries not conducted on the factory system excluded the country butcher. This bill is to give that authority. The director has prepared schedules for full information respecting the farm and packing houses.

Mr. KEIFER. It looks to me that you are simply, by this bill, extending the right to the Director of the Census, when a census is taken of the number of hides of animals of not only the packers—they seem to have been covered already—but the small butcher, wherever they may be located through the country, and not include the great number of cattle that are killed by individual farmers all over the country for their own use. If that is omitted here, I think this whole proposed new provision will be valueless for any purpose whatever.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Director of the Census says he has already ample authority to take the animals slaughtered on the farm and in the packing establishments, and the only thing this bill does is to cover the gap between those two. That is the purpose of the bill. We have got authority to take the census of the animals on farms. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KEIFER. I was not quite through.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in this proposed amendment, or in the law which it proposes to amend, which either authorizes or may be construed as authorizing the supervisors of the census, or any of the census enumerators, to gather and accumulate data or political information for purely political purposes?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no; there is no such thing in the law, and there is no such thing contemplated by the committee or by anybody connected with the census.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield for another question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I did not suppose there was anything in this bill that authorized any such procedure as that; but in view of the fact that information has reached the chairman that some efforts, at least, have been made along those lines, would not the gentleman consent to an amendment which would make it a criminal act for a census enumerator or supervisor thus to prostitute his duties and himself to such purposes?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course in this bill we are undertaking to get statistics. It is not a proposition to reform anything or anybody.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Would the gentleman consent to an amendment to make it a criminal offense?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; I will not consent to anything being added to the bill, except possibly——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. In view of matters that have come to the gentleman's attention, does he not think such a law ought to pass?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I think the man who is guilty ought to be sent to jail. I think we have sufficient law now to adequately punish anybody who has been prostituting the powers of his office to political or personal ends.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. What statute is there that would reach that kind of a case?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would be glad to take that up with the gentleman some time, but I do not care to do so now. We have this question up, and I want to get it disposed of.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I thought, as the gentleman had the information himself, he would likely favor the amendment suggested.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is an abundance of authority in the census law and in the penal law of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the history of this legislation, as I understand it, is that the tanners of the country had their attention directed to the fact that the law providing for the taking of the Thirteenth Census did not provide for taking a full census of hides. They therefore requested the Director of the Census to take a census showing all the hides and the animals slaughtered, not only on the farms and in packing houses, but everywhere else. The Director of the Census said that under the law he could not do it; that he did not have the power to do it, and therefore he suggested the idea contained in this bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What do the tanners want this census taken for?

Mr. HAY. Because they want full information and not partial information on this subject.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What benefit did the tanners say they would get if they had this information?

Mr. HAY. So that they would know how many hides were produced in this country.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Do the tanners think they are being squeezed by some other organization?

Mr. HAY. I have no doubt they do.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Did they make any statement before the gentleman's committee to that effect?

Mr. HAY. No; they did not make any statement before the committee at all. They were not before the committee.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has the gentleman any information whether or not the tanners of the country are getting squeezed by anybody?

Mr. HAY. I have no information as to whether they are getting squeezed. I presume they are getting squeezed by these trusts, like the rest of us.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman know that there is in this country such an institution as the leather trust, that is composed of a large number of tanners?

Mr. HAY. I do not know whether there is such a trust or not. I know there are a large number of independent tanners who do not belong to the trust, and who are very anxious to get this information; tanners who live in my district, and tanners who live probably in the gentleman's district, who want this information and who are entitled to have it. Now, if the census is to gather information it ought not to be partial information, it ought to be full information, and the law as it is now does not provide for full information. This bill is only for the purpose of getting full information on this subject.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman state whether the committee received any information that if the census of hides was taken, the tanner would be in a position to increase or decrease the price of hides?

Mr. HAY. There was nothing said about increasing or decreasing the price of hides. The price of hides did not enter into the question. It is a question of statistics. It is a question of whether you are going to take a census showing the statistics of this industry in full, whether you are going to get all the information, all the statistics, or only partial information.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman say whether or not information from the sources along this line will be of any benefit to the tanners?

Mr. HAY. It will not only prove of benefit to the tanners, but of benefit to the people generally and to anybody who wants to study this industry and look into it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I quite agree with the gentleman; I think the provision incorporated in the amendment is a splendid one, because I think somebody is being squeezed in this industry.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill ought to be passed, not alone for what it does, but also for what it does not accomplish. It has already been very clearly stated on the floor by other gentlemen that the primary purpose of the bill is to secure full information concerning hides and the number of animals slaughtered for food purposes.

Under the general law providing for the taking of the Thirteenth Census, the census as to animals slaughtered and hides obtained is limited to the packing houses and to animals slaughtered on farms, and this bill extends the inquiry to those slaughtered in country butcher shops. The bill does not, however, gentlemen of the committee, authorize the securing of information as to the political affiliations of citizens in any State, and in reply to a statement made by the chairman of the committee I desire to say here that efforts have been made to use the machinery of the Census Bureau for political purposes, and that fact is known to every Member of Congress who reads the daily newspapers and to the members of the Cabinet and the President himself, who a short time ago, I am informed, issued an order forbidding it.

I want to say to the committee that applicants for appointment as census enumerators in Missouri were informed, over the signature of a Member of Congress from the State of Missouri, that if he would present his application and undertake in advance to do political work, to ascertain the relative strength of the insurgents and the regulars in the State of Missouri, he could have easy sailing in getting the job. [Laughter.]

The chairman of the committee is apprised of that fact. Whatever may be the existing law on the subject, down in the State of Missouri applicants for appointment as enumerators of the census have been notified by a Member of Congress from Missouri that the only condition upon which they can get the job is that they shall be loyal, regular Republicans, and undertake to do work not connected with their duties as census enumerators and of a political character.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does my friend say that the letter which was written by one of my colleagues from Missouri——

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to say that it was not the gentleman addressing me.

Mr. BARTHOLDT (continuing). Was in any way attempting to speak for the administration? Was not it written solely on his own account and giving his own conception of the work that was to be done?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, in response to that I will ask permission to read the letter and insert it in the RECORD, and gentlemen of the committee may form their own conclusions.

The letter is as follows:

CARUTHERSVILLE, MO., September 9, 1909.

DEAR FRIEND: I received your letter and note all you say about being appointed census enumerator. Your being a Republican is the first qualification and you are O. K. in that line. You probably will be asked to do some extra work, not a part of your duty as enumerator, if you are appointed, but it is such work as any enthusiastic Republican will be glad to do, and will in no way conflict with your duty as enumerator.

This extra work will be outlined to you before you are appointed, so that you need not accept the appointment if you do not desire to do what will be asked of you.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Outlined by whom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I leave it to the gentleman to draw his own inference when it is announced that before he can get the appointment he must obligate himself to do the work.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I wonder if the administration was Democratic and had enumerators to appoint, whether the work would not be outlined for them.

The time of Mr. ROBINSON having expired, Mr. HAY yielded the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will finish reading the letter:

You get the indorsement of your county committee, and then if you are willing to do the extra work I think you will have easy sailing.

Yours, very truly,

C. A. CROW.

Mr. CLAYTON. What is his complexion in politics?

Mr. ROBINSON. He is a Republican from the State of Missouri.

Mr. CLAYTON. An insurgent or a regular?

Mr. LANGLEY. Will my friend permit me to ask what section of the bill he is addressing himself to?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am addressing myself to the fact that the bill does not embrace the legislation permitting enumerators to do political work, which I think the gentleman from Kentucky would like to see in it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman state whether this Member from Missouri was a regular or an insurgent?

Mr. ROBINSON. He is a regular of the regulars. I want to proceed now with the interview that was given by this gentleman. This letter was written after the executive order had been issued by the President.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is quoted in a current newspaper as follows:

"I did not realize how strictly President Taft intended his order," said Mr. CROW to-day. "The instructions I referred to as likely to be forthcoming were that the enumerators were to report informally to the Republican county or the district committee as to the sentiment they found—if the section they canvassed was filled with insurgent sentiment or whether it was inclined to stick by the regular party, or if there was defection that might take men out of the party altogether. We wanted to know where we stood, and this seemed a good and, I am sure, a legitimate way of ascertaining the lay of the land."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman that it is also an economical way of doing it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. He is further quoted as saying:

Of course, just as soon as President Taft reiterated his order, I stopped writing to the candidates for enumerators.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, as I understood the reading of that last interview, the gentleman said he wanted to know where he stood?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Well, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that if the gentleman lived in the Sixth district of Missouri he would know to-day darned well where he stands. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, in connection with that statement, it may be stated that the authentic way of ascertaining a political census is by holding an election, and down in Missouri, in the State from which the Member of Congress who wrote this letter comes, in the State from which the member of the Cabinet who is charged with enforcing this census comes, they held a political census just a day or two ago, and the results are very gratifying to gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield to me.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman whose letter has been read on this floor happens to be absent from the floor, inadvertently, I suppose. I regret very much that my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] saw fit to bring this matter up at a time when the writer of the letter himself was not able to answer for himself. I saw that letter printed in the newspapers, and I must say as a Republican Member of this House, having to do with recommendations for all kinds of offices, I was as much surprised as my friend from Arkansas at seeing such a letter.

Mr. ROBINSON. Surprised at the publication of the letter or at the contents of the letter?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. At the contents of the letter; because nothing that I have heard either from the department or from the Director of the Census would authorize me in giving such instructions or writing such a letter to any candidate for enumerator in my district. If my colleague has seen fit to write such a letter, I am sure it will turn out, and no doubt he will make his own explanation to this effect, that he has done so without authority from anyone connected with the administration or the executive department. He has told his friend——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In a minute. He has told his friend who made application for a position as enumerator simply that he expected him to be his political friend, and that is no more than any Republican or any Democrat on this floor would do.

Mr. CLAYTON. O Mr. Chairman, I submit that the letter says more than that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And where it says more, he has certainly exceeded his authority in representing the administration in a matter of this kind. I want to give to my friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] a sample of how strictly nonpartisan this administration is endeavoring to be in matters of census appointments. We had recommended in the city of St. Louis for superintendent of the census a well-known young business man, connected with a prominent business firm there for many, many years, known to the business world and known to all bankers there as a business man. He happened, however, to be a member of the central committee of that city, representing the twenty-eighth ward, and for that reason, although all the powers that be in the city of St. Louis representing that party were in his favor, he was turned down by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. In other words, he was turned down because of his connection with a political organization. I must say that I do not wholly approve that position, though the Secretary acted, no doubt, in accordance with the policy laid down by the administration. I want citizens to take an interest in party affairs. Because of the connection of a man with a party organization, I do not want him to be discriminated against when he seeks an office. I am sure my Democratic friends will agree with me in that respect; but he was turned down, and why? Because President Taft has laid down the policy that this census is to be taken as a nonpartisan task and that no man connected with a political organization should take part in it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does not this letter say that this man must be an enthusiastic Republican and he must ascertain the strength of the insurgents in the district? Now, we Democrats expect Republicans, as a rule, to fill the offices; but we think that in your own family row, when it comes to taking the census, you might be fair with your insurgent brethren.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Missouri will answer for that himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman from Missouri, who has just taken his seat, speaks for the Census Bureau and for the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. A resolution has been submitted to the Committee on the Census making inquiry or calling upon the Bureau of Census and Labor to find out whether any instructions had been given along the line of taking a political census, as stated in the letter just read by the gentleman from Arkansas, or whether any would be given, or whether it was a necessary qualification in a census enumerator that he should promise to take this political information. That resolution has not been reported. I do not know that it will be, but the gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. BARTHOLDT] says that the census is to be thoroughly nonpartisan, and that the Census Bureau has given out that kind of instructions. Then why, let me ask him, does the Census Committee refuse to call upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and let him so inform the House over his own signature, so we will know whether it is to be political or nonpolitical, and that he means exactly what he says? If we are to have a thoroughly nonpartisan census we are entitled to the information from the officer in charge and over his own signature.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And it is this. I should have made the point at the beginning of the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas, but I was not listening until he got fully launched. The gentleman from Missouri is not speaking to the bill. I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the latitude that is allowed as a general rule in general debate, but I want to know now whether that latitude of discussion is to apply to questions that come up on calendar Wednesday?

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I hope this is not coming out of my time; the gentleman is consuming it rapidly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am presenting to the Chair a question of order. I think the gentleman is not in order because he is not discussing the bill, and that on calendar Wednesday even the custom of discussing all sorts of questions in connection with bills does not apply, and that calendar Wednesday ought to be confined to the transaction of business that is called up on that day. That is the proposition I make.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and so far as the opinion of the Chair goes it is that the debate has not exceeded the limit generally taken in general debate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] However, it is in the power of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to determine, and unless the committee should determine to arise and report to the House to close debate, the gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I propose to test the sincerity of my friend from Missouri upon this proposition to know whether or not he is in favor of taking a census so we will have it thoroughly nonpolitical and nonpartisan, and I now send to the Clerk's desk an amendment which I propose to introduce at the proper time, and I ask to have it read in my time for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whoever, being a census enumerator, or other person employed in taking the Thirteenth Decennial Census of the United States, shall ask any question of any person of whom he is obtaining information respecting the census as to his political affiliations or sentiments, or of the political affiliations or sentiments of others, or shall make known to anyone such information acquired by him in connection with his work as such census enumerator or other census employee, shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than one year.

Now, that will test the gentleman from Missouri. If he is in earnest, he will vote for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. Well, it must have been taken up by the gentleman from Indiana, because I have not occupied it all.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman from Missouri has not been speaking for five minutes; he has not been speaking two minutes even, excluding the time taken by discussing the point of order, and the gentleman is still entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Clerk says ten minutes has expired since the gentleman took the floor.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the Member from Missouri who wrote that letter wrote it on his own initiative or not. It does not say so, and it does not bear that construction upon its face. He uses the pronoun "we" several times. "We" expect them to do thus and so. Who is "we?" The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, a gentleman for whom I have the highest admiration, is a member of the national Republican committee. He is a resident of the State of Missouri, and took an active part in the campaign that resulted in the election of the writer of the letter just read. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor also took an active part in the campaign which has just closed in the sixth district, as other gentlemen from Missouri have, and who knows but what the writer of that article was referring to the gentleman as "we" when he wrote. He certainly was not referring to the insurgents as "we." They are to be singled out.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. BOOHER. And I hope my friend from Massachusetts will not interrupt me, because I believe the insurgents were mighty numerous yesterday out in the sixth district of Missouri, as the returns show.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is in any way involved in that letter of the Congressman, or what does he mean by insinuating it?

Mr. BOOHER. I have not insinuated it unless a fair construction put upon language that anybody can understand would indicate it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Then the gentleman thinks, and is willing to say so to this committee, that, in his opinion, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor was back of that letter?

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman can not put any words in my mouth. He is at liberty to put such construction on my language as suits him.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The records put them there.

Mr. BOOHER. I have introduced a resolution, which is now pending before the Committee on the Census, to ask the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that very question. I have supposed I would get an answer to it, and I want the answer from the Secretary and not from anybody else. I will take the word of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon that or any other proposition, but I want it to come from him. We have had word from one Member of Congress, and we do not want another, because they will not agree.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does my colleague blame the insurgents for the result in the sixth Missouri district?

Mr. BOOHER. No; I am glad they turned out and got right once. The result of the election in the sixth district on yesterday shows conclusively that the people of this country can not be deceived all the time. Your party and its legislation was on trial there yesterday, and the verdict was overwhelmingly against you. If the insurgents, as you call them, aided in bringing about the result, it is a strong indication that their work here and elsewhere has not been in vain. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. I want to come to the help of my friend from Missouri, Mr. BARTHOLDT, and also my other friend from Missouri, Mr. BOOHER, by saying that in order to have a nonpartisan census taken in Tennessee every single supervisor in the State is a partisan Republican, and appointed because he is a Republican. They are competent to take the census, I have no doubt, but in order to have an absolutely nonpartisan census in Tennessee every man appointed is a partisan Republican, but they have delivered them a lecture to the effect that they must not be partisan. Does not that show that we are going to have a nonpartisan census? If you were going to have a nonpartisan election would you appoint all Republicans or all Democrats and then give them a lecture? I know from the statement of the gentleman from Missouri that the way to have a nonpartisan census is to have a partisan instrumentality by which it is to be——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman informed of the fact that in the appointment of census supervisors the usual rule has been in Democratic States to appoint Republicans and in Republican States to appoint mugwump or Democratic supervisors?

Mr. SIMS. Has that been the rule—the Republican rule?

Mr. MANN. That is the rule so far as my information has gone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MANN. That is the case in my territory.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Out of 24,000 voters I have three Republican supervisors.

Mr. MANN. That is what I stated.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE].

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, I am glad this matter came up. It gives me an opportunity to relate the experiences we are having in Wisconsin, the hotbed of insurgents. Up in one of the districts where we have an insurgent one of the most prominent Republicans who stayed by the Cannon system was defeated in the last election, and in that district they appointed a supervisor over the protest of that insurgent Republican, Mr. LENROOT. In another district represented by another gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. NELSON, the condition is the same, according to newspaper reports. They did the same thing in the district of that great insurgent, Mr. CARY, who usually walks out of the caucus when it tries to gag and bind him and his constituents. They appointed a man over his recommendation. But they split there, because there was an insurgent and a standpatter in the city of Milwaukee, and the standpatter made the appointment. There is some excuse for that.

But the other two appointments, I am willing to say, were made absolutely against the recommendations of the insurgents. I have nothing in this fight, and I regret that a census for commercial and business purposes is going to be taken for political purposes, by politicians along partisan lines of the system, to the detriment of the public interest and good government.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman think that is true?

Mr. WEISSE. I am willing to insert newspaper clippings and editorials from Republican papers in my State showing its truth, and I believe I can get a good number of them, and, if necessary, I think that the insurgents would be willing to get up on this floor and defend my position in the matter. My information comes from interested and well-informed persons. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe men should vote according to their own ideas and represent their people, and not make a party issue out of every business question that comes up. It appears we are unable to take up even such a matter as the taking of the census without some one making it a party issue or some one wanting to use the enumerators, paid by the Government, for personal and political purposes. We had enough of this in Wisconsin the last few years, and it has cost our taxpayers thousands of dollars.

"DARE TO DO OUR DUTY."

[From the Milwaukee Free Press, Tuesday, January 11, 1910.]

"Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it."—Abraham Lincoln.

CONSISTENT AT LEAST.

The opponents of Speaker CANNON in Congress and elsewhere must give him credit for one thing, at least, and that is consistency.

In some cases this devotion to expressed views and ideas, even though their origin lie in the mist-wreathed past, has given rise to the charge that "Uncle Joe's" mind is as fixed and steadfast as the northern star," and therefore unamenable to the allurements of progressive thought and enterprise.

In his attitude toward the victory of the combined Democrats and insurgent Republicans, however, his consistency is not likely to call forth any such criticism from his enemies; indeed, it should rather prompt them to see something of virtue in the despised "Cannon idea."

For the Speaker will not fight to regain his power to appoint the House members of the Ballinger investigation committee, and why? Because to do so would be to repudiate his time-honored shibboleth, "The majority rules."

Should the Senate attempt to interfere with the desire of the House majority to elect its own members to the said committee, we doubt not that the Speaker will resent its attempt to interfere with the prerogative of his Chamber, although the majority of that chamber in this matter was composed of his enemies.

No doubt this attitude of Speaker CANNON is the part of wisdom, but even if we hold it thus, it is a wisdom which at least has the merit of consistency, which is a quality of which many more progressive politicians than the Danville fixture can not boast.

WILL BADGER BUNCH GAIN BY THE MOVE?—REPORTS THAT EMBARGO ON FEDERAL PATRONAGE IS TO BE REMOVED AND INSURGENTS ARE TO BE GIVEN RECOGNITION—GREAT INTEREST IN THIS STATE AS TO WHETHER THE WISCONSIN PROGRESSIVE MEMBERS OF CONGRESS WILL BE AMONG THOSE ADMITTED TO PATRONAGE PIE COUNTER—PLENTY OF EVIDENCE THAT THEY HAVE BEEN SHUT OUT OF LATE.

[From the Milwaukee News, January 15, 1910.]

MADISON, WIS., January 15, 1910.

Republicans in Wisconsin are watching eagerly to see if the lifting of the embargo from insurgents obtaining federal patronage applies to the Wisconsin bunch as well as those from other States. Outside magazines like The Outlook can write editorials ad infinitum and Wisconsin papers like the STEPHENSON organ can echo these editorials, but the people of Wisconsin know full well that federal patronage has been withheld from Wisconsin men because they have actual experience on the subject. Pen denials of the fact that patronage is being withheld from Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE will do no good when the public has only to think that months ago Senator LA FOLLETTE recommended William J. McElroy, of Milwaukee, for the position of United States district attorney for Milwaukee, and that the appointment has not yet been made, but instead that H. K. Butterfield, of Hartford, the incumbent from a former administration, still holds the place.

NO ACTION ON SCHULZ.

The Wisconsin public is also fully aware that Senator LA FOLLETTE during state-fair week recommended for the position of collector of customs for the city of Milwaukee Henry Schulz, of the ninth ward; but this place is still filled by W. H. Devos, with no indications that the federal Treasury Department is in any hurry to act on the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the appointment. These facts in themselves show how Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE is being treated in the matter of appointments down in Washington and whether insurgents are being given any pie from the federal pie counter by President William Howard Taft and the other lights at the national capital who are angry because some Republicans are having the hardihood to dare disobey the dictates of the Republican national "machine" and not jump at the beck and call of the national whips.

MANY OTHER INSTANCES.

Then it might be mentioned, even in such a little matter as census appointments, the recommendations of Wisconsin insurgent Congressmen have not been recognized, President Taft having gone deliberately over the heads of Congressmen LENROOT, CARY, and NELSON in his selections of men for census enumerators in the district represented by these men and having selected men for the positions who did not have the recommendations of the Congressmen. This fact stares Wisconsin people in the face, and they know a thing or two about the way their Representatives at the national capital are being treated in the distribution of plums.

In fact, so flagrant was the turning down of some of the recommendations of Wisconsin insurgents in regard to the selection of census appointments that Senator LA FOLLETTE has felt constrained, as chairman of the Census Committee of the United States Senate, not to report two of the census appointments from Wisconsin for confirmation by the Senate, the idea of the Madison United States Senator in his stand being undoubtedly to impress on the people of the Nation the way Congressmen from Wisconsin districts have been treated at the national capital in the matter of recognition in the way of patronage.

AS TO POST-OFFICE JOBS.

Then there have been some recommendations from Wisconsin insurgent Congressmen in regard to the appointments of postmasters which have been mysteriously held up, just as has been the appointment of W. J. McElroy for United States district attorney, and the only result from these actions has been to show the people of Wisconsin how their Representatives are regarded by the national political officials because of their hardihood in making a fight for what they considered as just and right as regards legislation. No amount of denials by The Outlook or Wisconsin cuckoos will change opinions based on this state of facts.

The Washington dispatches are to the effect that President Taft has reconsidered his plans for the nonrecognition of recommendations from insurgents in regard to federal appointments, and from this time on these recommendations will be given some attention. It can be said that real friends of President Taft in Wisconsin hope this statement will prove correct, for as far as the President is concerned he has not improved his standing with the rank and file of the Republican party in this State by disregarding the recommendations of the insurgents.

REALIZE THEIR MISTAKE.

There have been a few old hard-shell Stalwarts who think that everything that can be done to hit Senator LA FOLLETTE is a political gain for them and who do not seem to remember that the pursuance of this course on their part in Wisconsin for years has strengthened Senator LA FOLLETTE with the people. These smirk and approve the President's course, but the wiser even among the political opponents of Senator LA FOLLETTE know that this withholding of the regular federal patronage which comes with their offices from Senator LA FOLLETTE and his supporters has been of great advantage to Senator LA FOLLETTE, who thrives on petty persecution of this kind.

The bulk of the supporters of Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE in Wisconsin are not people who are influenced a particle by patronage. They are people who are really for the issues to which Senator LA FOLLETTE has been showing his support down in Washington, and such political plays as the withholding of patronage from Senator LA FOLLETTE and his supporters merely emphasizes to these people that he is being struck by his political enemies with those blows because he has dared stand up against legislation which he has considered was for the benefit of the interests and against the people.

THE SHAMELESS TRUTH.

[From the Milwaukee Journal.]

When the announcement first was made that President Taft, listening to the maladroit advice of Spoilsman Hitchcock, had entered upon a policy to "discipline" the Republican insurgents by withholding from them patronage, The Outlook—Theodore Roosevelt, contributing editor—could not bring itself to believe that he would be capable of such action. "The President," it said, "has shown through the years of his public life so high a standard of disinterested public service that no one of intelligence could credit a report that he would use his appointing power in any arbitrary way without respect to the fitness of the appointees." And, besides:

"Those who are known to be 'insurgents' against the oligarchical group headed by Speaker CANNON are not enemies of Mr. Taft's administration or opponents of his policy. On the contrary, whether wisely or not, they have acted uniformly with a view to carrying out the very policies for which Mr. Taft is known to stand."

The Outlook, in making comment on current affairs, is published under the limitations placed upon a weekly newspaper designed for national circulation. A great deal may happen within a week. What it conceived several weeks ago to be incredible to one of intelligence actually came to pass. Upon that point all of the Washington correspondents of any standing were agreed. The Washington Star, which is a recognized administration mouthpiece, reported that the "official statement issued by the Republican congressional committee, which it is known has the approval of President Taft, states the attitude of the campaign committee toward insurgents within the party." They were warned that—

"The President, Vice-President, the Speaker, and many other Republican leaders have stated that the present law is the best tariff we have ever had, and the results of its operation confirm that statement. The Republican congressional committee makes no issues with any individual insurgents, but it will oppose to the full extent of its power the principle of insurgency and will advocate the nomination and election of regular and loyal Republicans. It concedes the right and privilege of individual opinion and its expression, but maintains with the President that there must be party solidarity if the best in legislation and administration is to be attained."

How stupid it is, then, for a daily newspaper, which should be conversant with the facts, to recite that President Taft has been the victim of "lying rumors" circulated by the "unrest papers," and that "he has not even contemplated using federal patronage to punish House insurgents." Yet we find the Younger Twin asserting that "the President has shown no disinclination to consult the patronage desires of any insurgent save those in the Senate."

And this in the face of the fact that Representative LENROOT'S recommendation of census supervisor in the eleventh district was ignored by the President. He was punished and disciplined. So were Congressmen NELSON and CARY. So were insurgent Congressmen from other States. Senator STEPHENSON was rewarded, in the case of Dresser, for his fidelity to ALDRICH and the betrayal of his constituents. Dresser's chief qualification consisted in the fact that when a state officer he distributed several thousand dollars for the Senator in the primary campaign, and when placed on the witness stand had destroyed his account books, bank books, and other written evidence, and was unable to remember little save that he received the money and spent it. So he was appointed.

Such is the record, and neither stupidity, if it be such, nor the brazen impudence of a discredited organ, if it be not the folly of an obtuse mind, can change it to meet the exigencies of the administration's embarrassment.

The idea finds utterance in the Louisville Courier-Journal, Colonel Watterson giving it voice:

"We are not willing to see in the affaire Pinchot-Ballinger merely the first gun in the inevitable war between Taft and Roosevelt. Even that drives deeper than appears above surface. It will be, when it arrives, a kind of destiny. The protective system is as bound to go as ever the institution of African slavery was bound to go. Theodore Roosevelt, the most astute politician now alive, realizes that and has for a long time realized it. The Republicans of the West are with him almost to a man. BEVERIDGE and CUMMINS and DOLLIVER and NELSON and BRISTOW, not to mention LA FOLLETTE, and all the insurgents of the House—good Republicans every one—know they can long hold none of their States upon any high protectionist measure such as the Payne-Aldrich Act. By throwing himself into the arms of ALDRICH and CANNON and the standpatters, Taft commits his administration to a high-protective system and certain defeat. Roosevelt can alone save the day."

At Washington there is a cry of peace, peace; but there can be no peace. It would avail nothing, as long as privilege remains undisturbed, if CANNON and Ballinger should be forced to retire. It would not quiet the storm if in desperation the ship's crew should seize hold of ALDRICH, the captain, and HALE and LODGE and BURROWS and ELKINS, the mates, stewards, and engineers, and heave them overboard. These men represent the forces of exploitation. They typify certain evils and obstruct the way. But they are not the issue. The issue is not one of men, though men enter into it, but one of policies and principles. It has varied phases. It is not an issue confined to any country or people. It is world-wide. In England it finds emphasis in the land question. But wherever it is found the issue is the privilege of the few in conflict with the inherent rights of the many. It may be a franchise working to the public injury, a tariff privilege placing extortion on the people, a title defrauding the public domain of coal lands or water power; but whatever its phase, the issue remains the same.

Mr. Taft can not serve under the flag of exploitation—he can not make common cause with ALDRICH and the forces that he typifies—and lead the people to victory.

LITTLE JOURNEYS LIGHTLY JOTTED.

Writing from Washington to the Detroit News, a Taft supporter in the presidential campaign, George E. Miller, says that "President Taft is thoroughly angry at those who are urging him to break with Senator ALDRICH and Speaker CANNON. To-day one of his intimate friends from Ohio made this explanation, as representing exactly the way President Taft feels: 'It is no secret that President Taft and his advisers have become vexed at the prevailing character of criticism that is sweeping the country in and out of the Republican party, criticism that is aimed at the cooperation that the President is trying to establish between himself and the leaders of party in the two houses of Congress. He might entertain for all of them a profound dislike, personally and officially, and yet if the present session of Congress is to do anything to give the country the legislation it is demanding, he must work with these men and they must work with him.'"

KILL THE INSURGENTS, AND THEN?

[From the Milwaukee Journal, January 6, 1910.]

There is quite general agreement among the Washington correspondents of the newspapers of the principal cities of the Middle West that it is the purpose of the Republican organization to invoke the aid of the administration in an effort to crush the congressional insurgents and end the progressive movement.

John Callan O'Laughlin, the correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, reports that "all the great forces of the Republican party are being used to crush the insurgents." The insurgents are to feel the weight of the administration's displeasure. They are to be denied patronage. None of their measures or amendments is to be given consideration. They are to be treated as outlaws—pariahs to be shunned and isolated. "The fact that President Taft has been drawn into the conflict between the standpatters and insurgents in Congress," Mr. O'Laughlin thinks, "is one of the surprising and, in many respects, sensational developments of this struggle."

The Washington correspondence in the Record-Herald states the situation essentially as it is set forth in Mr. O'Laughlin's dispatches. Postmaster-General Hitchcock, we are told, has stated without reservation that the administration purposes to make no appointments upon the recommendations of Republican insurgents. CANNON and ALDRICH and the discipline of the party organization are at stake. CANNON may go, undoubtedly will go, but discipline must be maintained if the organization's usefulness to "the interests" is not to be jeopardized. "Leaders in Congress on the Republican side," it is asserted by the Record-Herald correspondent, "have grown accustomed to perfect discipline and explicit obedience. They can not tolerate the presence in their ranks of insurgents or independents. Their own views regarding legislation and policy should be accomplished rather than the sentiments of the people represented by those they would now read out of the party."

The situation of affairs comes as no revelation to the readers of the Journal. From the very opening of Congress our Washington dispatches have recited that the administration and the CANNON-ALDRICH organization have joined in unholy alliance to punish insurgent Representatives and Senators for their unpardonable offending in voicing the sentiments of their constituents and standing out against the granting of greater privileges to the tariff beneficiaries at a time when the people have been led to expect a curtailment of privilege and release from the clutches of tariff-sheltered monopoly. The insurgents are to be punished for being true to their party's pledges and Mr. Taft's promises.

What will be the effect upon the constituents of the insurgents when they receive the ultimatum that if they would remain in the good graces of the administration they must repudiate the Senators and Representatives in Congress that have been true to their interests—that if they would love Taft, they must love his ALDRICH-CANNON dog? If human nature has not materially changed since Mr. Taft was inaugurated to the office of President, we should say that it will arouse a wave of indignation in the West which will leave the administration discredited and without the moral sanction of its people. If the issue shall be forced, it can have but one ending. There will be no second term for Mr. Taft, and the power of ALDRICH and CANNON and the forces of evil that they typify will be broken beyond repair.

BADLY ADVERTISED.

[From the Milwaukee Daily News, Thursday, January 13, 1910.]

As near as can be determined from the Washington reports, Postmaster-General Hitchcock seems to be the adviser who is principally to blame for President Taft's announced decision to punish the insurgents by depriving them of their patronage.

Those who remember Mr. Hitchcock's career as an Assistant Postmaster-General, and who have not forgotten the "steam-roller" methods adopted at the Chicago convention, will find little difficulty in believing that he is the person who is responsible for the presidential attitude.

Just at present, facing as he is a grave crisis in his administration, it is unfortunate for the President that he should have been advised by a man of the Hitchcock temperament and methods. The occasion was one which called for tact, not bluff; for diplomacy, not blows; and had it been properly handled, the split in the Republican party, daily growing in extent, would not have been precipitated.

Mr. Taft could readily have discovered that the fight on Cannonism, waged by the insurgents, was not directed against his own progressive measures, but, rather, meant strong support for them. And he would have learned that the mass of the people are back of the insurgents.

Judicious and tactful handling of the situation would have saved much trouble. But the advice of Hitchcock, the adoption of the "steam-roller" methods, and the resultant lining up of the President with the reactionaries has disrupted the party and put the Taft administration in an unenviable position, from which it will have great difficulty in extricating itself, if it be possible to do so at all.

WILL BE REASONABLE.

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel, Thursday, January 6, 1910.]

Recent outgivings from Washington as to the allotment of federal patronage will not make comfortable reading for gentlemen in expectancy of political plums through the favor of Senators and Representatives who have factiously gone out of their way to thwart and embarrass the administration, and even to insult and vilify and attempt to undermine President Taft. But they must blame their predicament of hope deferred on the factious perversity and selfish rancor of their chiefs.

Patronage is purely a matter of usage and courtesy. And, we repeat, there must be some reciprocity of courtesy and cooperation. The President is not going to repay insult with favors. Republican Senators who, for reasons best known to themselves, elect to block the administration, imperil the party, hamstring the President—in a word, to act with or for the Democratic opposition—can not reasonably expect the administration favors and courtesies due to loyalty and cooperation.

It is primarily their fault if their satellites at home must chew the bitter cud of disappointment as applicants at what is colloquially called the "pie counter."

Now, let us remark here that President Taft is an eminently fair and judicious man, not at all a narrow and vindictive man; and we believe his course in this regard of patronage will reflect those qualities. He will act with discrimination and fairness.

To suppose for a moment that he will take a stupid Andrew Jacksonian course of blacklisting every Senator and Representative not obsequiously subservient to his views and recommendations is nonsense. He is too big a man to cherish and wreak a lot of small personal grudges; he is too wise a man not to see the impolicy of planting a crop of martyrs.

That he will institute a wholesale proscription of "progressives" who differ from him about the tariff is wildly improbable. That he will set up fealty to Senator ALDRICH or Speaker CANNON as a touchstone of good Republicanism and of fitness for administration favors is unthinkable.

Our impression is that not only some factious radicals but also Messrs. ALDRICH and CANNON will be required to dismount from their high horses occasionally before this Taft administration is over with.

As for allotment of patronage courtesies, there are, in respect of disagreements with President Taft, progressives and progressives.

There are progressives with venom on their tongues and treason in their hearts—selfish factionists and disorganizers who apparently mean to do all they can to balk and discredit the Republican administration and the man at the head of it and Bryanize their party. Such men and their tools are deservedly liable to some hard rebuffs and disappointments in the distribution of offices. Can they reasonably expect anything else?

As for the progressives of the broad-minded type, good Republicans who, fairly and with due regard to the fact that this is a Taft administration, exercise their right to have and promote their individual opinions, we expect they will find President Taft eminently fair and considerate in the treatment of federal patronage.

THE FIGHT IS ON.

[From the Milwaukee Daily News, Thursday, January 6, 1910.]

Observers of affairs at Washington will not be astonished at the reports of the termination of President Taft's "neutrality." His leaning toward the reactionary element of the party was evidenced in the Winona speech last September. It has been more and more strongly foreshadowed every day since the assembling of Congress in December.

The surprise comes in the measures which, it is said, will be adopted in the fight against the insurgents. The history of the country shows no such severity of discipline as it is proposed to mete out to the insurgents who refuse to bow to the presidential mandate on all matters of legislation. If the programme is carried out, the insurgent Congressmen might as well remain at home, and the insurgent Senators will have nothing to do but make occasional speeches, a right of which, under the rules of the Senate, they can not be deprived.

If he takes this step, on advice of CANNON, ALDRICH, and the other reactionary leaders, President Taft will make a fatal mistake. He will stand before the country in the light of a man who is willing to bribe with patronage in order to insure the success of his measures. He will occupy the even more unenviable position of a man who would force his policies down the throats of the lawmakers, regardless of their convictions of the desires of their constituents. Even Theodore Roosevelt, with all his radicalism, all his impatience of contradiction, all his bluster, never went to such extremes as this.

If the progressives of the House and Senate are fighting for principle, they will not be influenced by the promises or threats of the administration. If they are influenced by them, it is well for the people to know it. The information will be forthcoming promptly.

Should Mr. Taft persist in the course laid out for him, he has signed his political death warrant. He has himself split his party irritrievably. The insurgent sentiment is strong throughout the country. The people are awake to the dangers of Cannonism and Aldrichism. And a bitter war precipitated by Mr. Taft and his reactionary advisers will do more to crystallize sentiment against him and his administration than could any other method. The President, having allied himself with the reactionary wing of the party, will go down with it to defeat which is inevitable.

ONE KIND OF INSURGENT.

[From the Milwaukee Free Press, Thursday, January 6, 1910.]

Those insurgent Congressmen who in their zeal have turned upon President Taft himself are now attempting to stir up a mighty to-do because they are not receiving their expected share of patronage.

They seem to hold that it is perfectly legitimate for a Republican Senator or Representative to attack and oppose the head of the administration, but when that administration can not see their claim to partisan reward after such hostility they accuse it of perfidy.

In other words, these gentlemen who prefer to be "insurgents" rather than Republicans in Congress, are as "regular" as the stauncest old-line Republican when it comes to the distribution of the spoils in their home bailiwicks.

Then the President is expected to stand by them, although they are doing everything to discredit and defeat the President. Yet these same insurgents would raise their hands in holy horror if they were asked to recommend one of their opponents for office.

We have no quarrels with the principles of the insurgents. Their work and their propoganda is leavening the Republican party. But we have no approval for that small group which is trying to change what should be a legitimate, intra-party reform movement along the lines of progressive principle into a warfare in which disruption of character, besmirching of motive, and self-exploitation are leading features.

We have no tolerance for the men of this group when they turn upon the head of their party, the Executive of the Nation, a man as sincerely devoted to the welfare of the people as they, because his temperment and experience does not incline him to employ the same methods.

We have no tolerance for them when, because they feel they can not join with him in some issues, they oppose him in everything and withhold their aid where they could conscientiously give it.

We have no tolerance for them when they take advantage of popular impatience—because the new administration does not indulge in fireworks and breakneck methods—to foment distrust and arouse suspicion of the purposes and motives of the new President.

That brand of insurgence, instead of being constructively progressive, is destructively retrogressive.

It not only inhibits the wheels of progress in Washington, but it makes a chaos of sound public opinion.

It fosters that most unfortunate state of mind which suspects everything except denunciation and has no faith in reform if it does not come in the guise of a thunderbolt.

Happily this brand of insurgency is not in the ascendant. There are in Congress to-day many sincerely progressive Members who will fight the abuses of the old guard and its domination, who will stand everything that savors of reaction, but who will do so without sacrificing their party or the policies to which they can lend support merely to play the rôle of heroes and martyrs.

For these insurgents we have only admiration and encouragement. With them no Republican, whatever his shade of belief, can justly quarrel. Nor will there be any curtailment of their patronage.

TAFT'S NEUTRALITY.

[From the Milwaukee Daily News, Thursday, December 2, 1909.]

* * * * * * *

It is difficult to reconcile the assertion that President Taft is seeking to maintain a neutral attitude in face of his utterances and his acts. He has made open and common cause with Aldrich and Aldrichism. He could not go further in his embrace of reaction if he should take CANNON to his bosom. In the distribution of the patronage his administration has gone out of its way to ignore and disregard the recommendations of progressive Senators and Representatives. If that is neutrality, then the Executive's open enmity should be welcomed by the progressives.

[From the Milwaukee Daily News, Thursday, December 2, 1909.]

Business and not "politics" should be the aim and end of the coming session of Congress. Practical statesmanship and not self-seeking is desired from the people's representatives.—Wausau Record-Herald.

FOR HIS OWN POLICIES.

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel, Friday, January 7, 1910.]

* * * * * * *

All the President will expect from those who solicit favors and courtesies from him is a reasonable degree of loyalty and cooperation from them. He has a right to expect it, and to employ reprisals if he does not get it. He is a good-natured, tolerant man, but no meek nonresistant and pocketer of insult.

UNDER WHICH FLAG.

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel, Tuesday, January 25, 1910.]

The un-Republican or antiadministration type of insurgency in the House has evidently forced President Taft to abandon his early attitude of noninterference with the legislative branch.

If he wants his measures passed against a treacherous cabal to make his administration a failure, he must take a hand in the congressional fight for them. His methods will be less strenuous and directly coercive than President Roosevelt's; but they may well be more effective and certainly should be more conducive to harmony.

One powerful weapon he has available against this seditious and factional spirit which for political ends is underhandedly trying to discredit and undermine him, and we hope he will use it. He can appeal to the people in behalf of his measures and against the self-seeking tricksters. That was Governor Hughes's unfailing recourse.

There are two widely differing types of House insurgency. There is the anti-CANNON insurgency proper, which is entirely compatible with loyalty to party, President, and administration. Then there are insurgents who make no scruple of secretly antagonizing the administration and exploiting the fight against CANNON to thwart and embarrass Taft. In common pariance, the main and ulterior purpose of these skulking bushwhackers is to "put Taft in a hole" and make his administration a failure.

But the President does not propose to be trapped or shot from the brush by these "Republican" camp followers.

If they are going to play the turncoat when the party needs their services, they must stand up and be counted. The House Republicans will caucus on strictly party and administration measures, and if there is any knifing to be done it must be done openly.

Taftism in the party is one thing and Cannonism in the House of Representatives quite another. The distinction between open and honorable anti-CANNON insurgency and furtive, treacherous, self-seeking antiadministration plotting and planning is going to be made very plain before this session of Congress is over.

HELPING UNCLE JOE.

[From the Milwaukee Daily News, Tuesday, December 14, 1909.]

Incidentally to the movement for greater publicity for campaign expenses in congressional elections comes the interesting news that the Republican congressional committee is expending considerable sums of money in the campaign of publicity designed to present Speaker CANNON in a better light than he now occupies before the public.

It is not surprising that many members of the committee have taken the stand that such use of the committee's funds is improper and are considering the advisability of uttering an indignant protest against it.

However, under existing circumstances that is about as far as the objectors can go. The congressional committee is a close corporation. It collects its funds from various sources; is required to make no public reports, and it may, without legal impediment, expend these funds as it sees fit, unless those who contribute the money happen to raise objections.

And as a large proportion of the moneys raised are contributed by the privileged interests, the CANNON publicity campaign is doubtless looked upon by the donors with complacency.

Under the present system the congressional committee can almost make or break a candidate. If he has "been good," the committee can send large sums of money into his district to aid him in his fight for reelection. If he has incurred the displeasure of the committee, it can refuse him financial aid, and may further complicate the situation by giving substantial assistance to his opponent.

These abuses would be done away with in large measure by requiring complete publicity of expenditures in congressional campaigns. And certainly, if such a law were on the statute books, the committee would not be permitted to hire press agents a year ahead of the election for the purpose of exploiting the generally questioned virtues of Mr. CANNON.

[From the Racine Times.]

If there is any reading out of the Republican party, it will be those men who stand for and are identified with Aldrichism and Cannonism as expressed in vicious legislation, violated pledges, and perverted government.

Mr. HAY. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-eight minutes remaining.

Mr. HAY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I do not know that my colleague from Missouri ought to be too severely censured for writing the letter that has been read to the committee. He is a new Member, and of course was not on to all the tricks and turns practiced by his party, and was no doubt led to believe from the conduct of those higher up in authority that the same policy that was being pursued by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in the appointments of supervisors would be pursued when you come to select the enumerators. In my State every supervisor appointed was a Republican, notwithstanding the fact that the best that the Republicans can claim is that the State is a battle ground. If this is to be a nonpartisan census, as contended by my friend and colleague from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], will he tell us why, when we go to appoint the census supervisors, not one single Democrat from Missouri was selected?

Mr. GAINES. May I answer that question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Suppose that the President of the United States were a Democrat, would the gentleman think that the appointments ought to be made of Democrats or that he ought rather to appoint Republicans?

Mr. HAMLIN. If this is to be a census divorced entirely from any politics, and I were President of the United States, I believe I could find Republicans in Missouri whom I would be willing to trust with the taking of the census. If, on the other hand——

Mr. LANGLEY. Would you do it?

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman has not answered my question. If the President of the United States were a Democrat, would the gentleman want Democrats or Republicans appointed for these census positions?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. One of the greatest Republicans that ever sat in the White House did appoint Democrats. I refer to Mr. McKinley.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have the floor. The point I make is this, that if there is not to be any suspicion that this census is to be influenced or the information gathered shall not contain any political information whatever, why is it in close States there are not some Democratic supervisors appointed instead of all being Republicans?

Mr. HAY. I reserve the balance of my time. [Cries of "Read!"]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that gentlemen on the other side are tolerably hard pressed for a political issue in the coming campaign to raise a question of this character at this particular time. So far as I am personally concerned, it is my opinion that a Republican can be just as just and fair and nonpartisan in taking this census as a Democrat can be. I want to say, further, that we have at the head of the Census Bureau a gentleman who is so desirous of being fair and nonpartisan in the administration of the affairs of that great bureau that he actually leans the other way, sometimes, in talking to Republican Congressmen about these census appointments. My judgment is, gentlemen of the committee, that this discussion, injected at this time, is improper and will tend only to embarrass the administration of the Census Bureau. We have never in the history of that bureau had a better class of men appointed as census supervisors than we now have in charge of this great work, and I regret that the gentleman from Arkansas saw fit to inject this matter——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman said a while ago that he thought that a Republican could take the census just as fairly as anyone else. Does the gentleman mean to imply by that remark that he believes that the enumerators should be appointed with reference to their political affiliatons? In other words, does he indorse the letter that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CROW] has published?

Mr. LANGLEY. I have not carefully read the letter to which the gentleman refers, and I can not say whether——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to give me three minutes more.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman can inform the House whether he stated or intended to have inferred from his remarks that he believed that the enumerators appointed to take this census should all be Republicans.

Mr. LANGLEY. If I had it in my power I should certainly give a very large majority, at least, of the appointments to the Republicans in my district. That is the way I feel about it as far as this census is concerned; and I want to say, furthermore, in my judgment if William J. Bryan or any other member of the gentleman's party were at the head of this Nation, we would not get a smell in the way of census appointments or anything else.

Mr. ROBINSON. When it comes to getting "smells," the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] always gets his smell when it comes to political appointments. [Laughter.] But now I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he commits himself to the policy of appointing only Republican enumerators, in violation of the statute which says they shall be nonpartisan?

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not; nor did I by my reply to the gentleman so commit myself. On the contrary, I desire to state to him that in my own congressional district there are to be a number of good Democrats—not bad ones—appointed to those positions.

Mr. HAMLIN. There are no bad Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, yes; there are quite a number. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that the debate on this bill has digressed in the manner it has. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] That remark seems to strike a very responsive chord in the hearts of gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. My regret is based upon the fact that a great many of us, representing committees of more or less importance, with bills upon the calendar, look forward to calendar day with some hope of getting our legislation considered. We have to-day established a precedent that debate altogether foreign to the legislation under consideration is not only in order, but proper, on calendar Wednesday. Before the end of this session of Congress gentlemen on the other side of the aisle will probably be complaining that calendar Wednesday is practically nullified by political and other kinds of irrelevant discussion.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that there has not been a word said that does not relate to the census. We have been sticking closer to our knitting than usual.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I insist that it is irrelevant debate that has no connection with the bill; and I insist, further, that it has no logical connection with the census. There may be down in Missouri, and possibly in Arkansas and Kentucky and Indiana, occasionally a man who is actively connected in some way or other with politics who, if he had his way about it, would appoint all the enumerators from members of his own party, but every man in this House knows that the Department of Commerce and Labor and the Bureau of the Census have outlined and published a policy that is absolutely nonpartisan, absolutely as fair as it is possible for an administrative concern to be.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, there is an old saying—

> For forms of government let fools contest;
> Whate'er is best administer'd is best.

Now, it is all right to have regulations, if they are obeyed, but this discussion went to the question of whether they were being obeyed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It had no sort of reference to the Census Office; no sort of reference to the Department of Commerce and Labor. It was not in relation to anyone who had any authority whatever to speak. It was not in relation to anyone who had any connection with the taking of the census.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman can not ignore the fact that a Republican Congressman, writing in reply to a question as to the conditions upon which he would indorse an application, made the statements which gave rise to this discussion. Now, it is childish to say that Members of Congress have nothing to do with these appointments.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is simply buncombe and political claptrap to insist that they do, under existing conditions. That is the only proper way to characterize such a statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman speaks with enough feeling to indicate that he, at least, has not had any influence.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have not sought any influence. I am interested in securing under the law, as it exists now, the best and most trustworthy census that the country has ever had, and I believe that conditions now prevail that will result in giving the country more for the money expended in the way of census taking than it has ever had before in the history of the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I hope the gentleman is right in that statement; but does not the gentleman know that in certain States, not represented on the floor of this House by any Republican, the supervisors in those States were appointed on the recommendation of what are called "Republican referees," indorsed by the Postmaster-General, who is the chairman of the national Republican committee?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I do not know.

Mr. MANN. The same thing was done in Chicago, notwithstanding. [Laughter.] I may say that I made no recommendation for the appointment of a census supervisor.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I did not hear what the gentleman from Illinois stated.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. He said that the same thing was done in Chicago.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois is a living witness to the fact that the present administration is not prostituting the Census Office or the administration of the census to partisan purposes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But what right has the Postmaster-General to dictate and interfere in the appointment of census supervisors?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is said that the Postmaster-General is doing things. I do not know whether he is or not, but somebody has to do them; somebody has to find out whether men are fit for the service or not. The President of the United States is charged under the law with the duty to appoint supervisors. He can not know them personally, and he must find out through somebody that does.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But how can the Postmaster-General know?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The President has laid down repeatedly certain rules governing the appointment of supervisors; the only course, it seems to me, that he could pursue.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. In my district a supervisor was appointed on the indorsement of five men, residents of the district, and the Republican referees living outside of the district, and added to that was the indorsement of the Postmaster-General, chairman of the national Republican committee.

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. I asked the gentleman to yield simply for the purpose of saying that the supervisor of New York County was so estimable a man and so satisfactory to the Democrats that Tammany Hall has asked him to resign and accept a position under that organization. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-six minutes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some misunderstanding as to the effect of the ruling recently made by the Chair. I want to ask if it is not a fact, now that we have entered upon a political discussion, that the gentleman from Missouri had entered originally upon the discussion, and the gentleman from Indiana claimed that it was wholly irrelevant to the bill and raised the point of order that operating under the rule by which we go into Committee of the Whole automatically on calendar Wednesday, we are confined to the particular bill under discussion. Is it not a fact that gentlemen on that side of the House contended that that was not the proper interpretation of the rule and that on calendar Wednesday it was proper for gentlemen to enter upon a discussion of any subject, wholly irrespective of the bill under consideration?

Mr. MANN. I submit that that question has not been submitted and has not been decided, and it is not fair to put the House in that attitude.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I submit that that identical question was decided. The gentleman from Arkansas opened the debate, and after he made a speech on that side the gentleman from Missouri made a speech on this side. I then made the point of order that the debate was irrelevant.

Mr. MANN. The Chair said that he had heard no debate that was irrelevant, and any man acquainted with parliamentary law would have held the same.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I say that the debate was irrelevant.

Mr. MANN. If this discussion is not relevant to a census bill, I can not imagine any bill to which it would be relevant.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Missouri, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania has asked me a question and I have not answered it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It may be the same question that I want to ask; I could not hear the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask if anybody voted for calendar Wednesday that had any idea that it was going to cut off the debate that we usually have on any bill which we want to debate in this House? The gentleman's speech seemed to lead in that direction.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We ought to have debate on bills, but the only question before the House is whether section 8 of the act providing for the taking of the Thirteenth Census shall be amended by adding to it a proviso for taking a census of the animals slaughtered in the country butcher shops, and the debate ought to be confined to this bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is this not one of the provisions in the bill now pending before the Houses:

> Whenever he shall deem it expedient, the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees, to be employed without respect to locality.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is not before the committee at all.

Mr. MANN. Well, I thought it was. I read it in the bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is a part of the present law.

Mr. MANN. I read it out of the substitute. I am familiar with what is in the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I don't care for the gentleman's interpretation. I think everybody knows that the only thing we are to determine is whether we will take a census of animals slaughtered in country butcher shops.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be in order to offer an amendment to strike that out of the bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think so.

Mr. MANN. And if it is stricken out, would it not be the law?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield any further upon this question to anybody. Now, I think we ought to begin the reading of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further general debate, the Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield the floor to me.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor in his own right. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to detain the committee, but I think the committee ought not to pass without question the statement that the Chair had ruled, whatever the Chair might rule if that question were presented, that debate upon any question would be in order in the consideration of this bill. Whether the Chair would so rule on debate in the Committee of the Whole may be presented to the Chair before a great while on some bill and be ruled upon, but the bill that was presented and is now before the Committee of the Whole is the existing eighth section of the census act, with a modification, and every provision that is in the existing eighth section, with the proviso, is now before the House for discussion. It authorizes a range of discussion concerning appointments, because in itself it provides for appointments, and certainly the discussion that has taken place in the House under the rules of the House has been strictly in order.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized in my own right for a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the next census taken is going to be taken fairly and in a nonpartisan way. Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have told us so. The President of the United States himself has said so. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor has said so, and even the Director of the Census has said so. The Director of the Census said that the department was so tenacious of its purpose and so thoroughly determined to have the very best men, that the best man would be chosen regardless of politics; and he also said that where a man had filled the office of supervisor in a former census and had made a good record, that man's record would stand against a world of political indorsement, in effect. Well, I presented him that kind of a case, a splendid Democrat, a man who, during the administration of President McKinley, was supervisor of the census in the district which I have the honor to represent.

That man made a record in his office, and I asked the Director of the Census what it was. He gave it to me in writing and said it was A No. 1. He told me, in addition to that, that in appointing a supervisor this time care would be exercised to select a man from the largest city in the district, and next to that it must be near the geographical center of the district, so that there were three conditions—one, the best man of any political party; next, a man coming from the greatest center of business in the district; and, next, a man residing nearest the geographical center of the district. Now, what did he do? My friend from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] said the director leaned uphill toward him and some of his Republican friends. Lord, he wobbled all around me! Why, he did not select a man of large experience, but a man who never had experience along this line of work. He did not go to the greatest business center in my district for his supervisor, but he took one from one of the smaller cities or towns of the district. He did not go to the geographical center of the district, but, on the contrary, went so near one end of it that had he gone 10 miles farther he would have gone up into the district represented by my colleague, Mr. LLOYD, for his supervisor; so that every condition he stated to me was violated in order to pay a party debt to a partisan Republican. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now this takes me back to the sixth district of Missouri, where we had a census yesterday under the immediate supervision of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and I tell you that the returns from that district are glorious tidings to democracy throughout the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These returns show that the untrammeled Democrats of that district, men who stand against the especial representatives of the Speaker, sent there to influence the result of yesterday's election; who would not even yield to the overtures of the President of the United States; men who defy the influences of boodle and corporate corruption, constitute nearly 4,000 majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, to go back to my own district, which is the very best in the State: Ten years ago a Democrat was supervisor; this year a Republican. Oh, the gentleman from Indiana scoffs, almost, at the suggestion that a Member of this House has anything to do with census taking and the appointment of enumerators. I want to say, and I believe the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] knows it, that a Member of Congress has all to do with it. I say that the Members of Congress who watch after these matters, like the author of the letter read this morning, control the nomination of supervisor, and they also control the appointment of every enumerator in that supervisor's district.

Gentlemen grow captious because we talk about these matters. My friend from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] wants to know what we would do if in power. Give us a chance and we will show you. It is my opinion to-day that if I should be here ten years from now I would favor the appointment of my good friend from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES], or some other Republican like him, who has been voted out of Congress, to be supervisor of census in the district in which he lives. [Applause on the Republican side.] The fact is——

Mr. LANGLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LANGLEY. I believe the gentleman from Missouri has a great political future ahead of him and it would not surprise me if the people of this country should some day make him President, if they ever conclude to commit such a grievous error as to elect a Democratic President. Now, I would like to ask him if, in the event he is President ten years from now, he will give me a Republican supervisor in the tenth district of Kentucky? [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Why, Mr. Chairman, feeling profound sympathy for my friend in the political obscurity which will surround him and his party ten years hence, if I can penetrate the gloom and find him I will give him anything he wants. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I will assure the gentleman that if he will come down to Kentucky then, I can be found.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I? I have an hour, have I not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will spend just a few more minutes in the sixth district of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this morning as I went from my home to my office every man I met was smiling except one or two, and they were stalwart Republicans—not insurgents—and they were the worst disgruntled set I ever saw, and well they may be, because I tell you, gentlemen, those of you who have not political sagacity enough to read the handwriting upon the wall, the pace we set in the sixth Missouri district yesterday is the pace the Democrats will duplicate throughout the country in November next. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And I want to say, moreover, that the chosen emissaries of the Speaker of this House and the representatives of his bounty and of his pleasure may go where they will, and wherever they go the people will rise up and smite them, because the American people have determined that henceforth and forever when they get a chance at the ballot box they will vote to free their Representatives and reestablish the principles of representative government in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. I now yield fifteen or twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and I hope he will devote five minutes of that time to the sixth district of Missouri. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will not use the entire time. Ten years ago I had the good fortune to be a Member of this House and the country had the good fortune to have one of the best Republicans as President of the United States that that party has ever produced, Mr. William McKinley. He appointed as Director of the Census General Merriam, and I had not the slightest idea that any Democrat would be appointed in my district to look after the census. I never asked for anybody to be appointed; I never recommended anybody until I was invited to do so. Finally I received a request from General Merriam to submit a recommendation for supervisor of census in my district.

I did so, but not until I was invited, and I was very much surprised when I was invited to do so; and I desire further to say the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] was, I think, appointment clerk, as I now remember, and he made not the slightest objection because I recommended a Democrat to be appointed. Not long after I was asked, without any initiative on my part, to recommend, or rather to make a recommendation, of two names for permanent clerks in the Census. I sent them in because I was doing what I was invited to do.

Mr. CLAYTON. Were you a member of the Census Committee at that time?

Mr. SIMS. I was not. I was not a member of the Census Committee at that time and never sought or asked any favor before it was given to me gratuitously.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman's statement is entirely correct. I would like to ask him this question, namely: If he agrees with the remarks his colleague has made this morning on that side of the House about nonpartisan appointments, why did he not recommend a Republican instead of a Democrat when we gave him the opportunity to recommend some one?

Mr. SIMS. When I get through I will not have to answer the question. It will answer itself. Shortly after that time—I think it was three——

Mr. LANGLEY I really think the gentleman got four or five.

Mr. SIMS. I was then afterwards asked to make a recommendation of three temporary clerks, as I now recall. I did it, and they were all appointed, and not being a Republican, but a Democrat, I recommended Democrats in every instance. And I never heard any complaint that they did not do their work well because they were Democrats.

I believe a Republican can take a nonpartisan census in the sense of doing his official duty, and that a Democrat can do the same. When the time came for taking the present census, and the fact being known that my recommendation was accepted before, applications began to pour in, both Republican and Democratic. I mean, requests to me to recommend them for appointment as supervisor. I think I have received about 25 letters from Democrats and about 15 from Republicans. I got tired of answering letters without knowing what was going to take place, and I finally went down and spoke to Mr. Durand, the Director of the Census.

I said to him, "What is going to be the policy of the administration? Are you going to appoint all Republicans, or some Republicans and some Democrats in Tennessee, and especially in my district?" He said, "The policy of the administration is to appoint the best men." I said, "Mr. Director, I will not deceive you. There are Republicans in my district that are fully competent to be supervisors of that district. They are just as competent as Democrats. You can get competent men from either party in my district. On the other hand, I doubt whether you can get all Republican enumerators as competent, as a class, as Democrats, on account of certain enumerators' districts in certain counties being almost altogether colored. I have not come to deceive you or to make any misrepresentation whatever, but I want to know so as to tell these gentlemen what can be done, if anything." He said, "We want the best men, and I would ask you to submit a recommendation." I told him there was no use of submitting a recommendation and getting into trouble down home if my recommendation was to have no weight and was not to be considered. I said, "Partisan as I am, if I was a Republican and could get as competent a Republican as I could a Democrat, I would appoint him." I say so yet. I say you have a right, when you do not sacrifice competency and efficiency, to appoint Republicans, and I do not blame you for it.

But here is what I do blame you for. It is for the hypocritical pretenses that you want an absolutely nonpartisan census, and that the way to get it is to appoint exclusively partisans to take it. They can give you an absolutely nonpartisan census, either Democrats or Republicans, if they do their duty, but is it not most natural, if you wanted nonpartisan work done, that you should have a mixed body?

Why is it that every census supervisor in Tennessee is a Republican? It is not that you can not get competent men who are Democrats. If you want to avoid partisanship, why not make appointments from both parties. In Republican States give them some Democrats and in Democratic States give them some Republicans, when they are qualified and competent to discharge the duties of the office. I do not blame them for appointing Republicans. If I could go into private history, not personally connected with myself, I could state that it was given out, when considering only the good of the service, that it was determined to divide the appointments in Tennessee; but, for some reason or other which we can not possibly attribute to a desire to benefit the service, afterwards it was decided to appoint nobody but Republicans in that State. Eight of those supervisors came from one faction of the Republicans in Tennessee and two came from another.

Now, we might just as well be candid in speaking about this matter; it is not necessary to make any false pretense. No doubt you want a true and fair census, and no doubt you will get it; but do not claim that you are adopting the best method possible to get a nonpartisan census. That can not possibly be true when you appoint only partisan Republicans to take the census.

There may be places in some of the Southern States where there are not Republicans qualified to take the census. There may be Southern States where there are not competent Republicans, and in that place you appoint a Democrat, but not to get a nonpartisan census. You have appointed a Democrat where it is impossible to change the political complexion by so doing or to get any political advantage in a particular district. Perhaps Democrats would do just like you, with the exception that I hope they would not pretend they did not have a partisan purpose. Now, I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky to answer this question: Do you think I am correct about it?

Mr. LANGLEY. I am not clear about what the gentleman means by a partisan census. They have to ascertain and report certain facts. The law provides a heavy penalty if they report that which is not a fact. Does the gentleman mean by partisan census a falsification of figures as to any particular inquiry, and that there is any more likelihood of a Republican census official making a false report of the facts than a Democratic census official?

Mr. SIMS. Well, do you doubt that a Democrat under oath would be as true to his work as a Republican?

Mr. LANGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. SIMS. Then, why draw the line on Democrats?

Mr. LANGLEY. I think that a Republican administration should give preference to those of its own party; and I do not think in doing so that it thereby implies that they are going to take a partisan census.

Mr. MANN. Why not say so, and abandon the policy of saying that you should not do it, and yet do it?

Mr. SIMS. Now, why pretend that you are not acting in a partisan way and for partisan benefit, when you know that the appointing of enumerators all over the United States is a great political asset? Now, is it not?

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not think so.

Mr. SIMS. What do you do it for?

Mr. LANGLEY. I think our census office is being managed in a businesslike way. I believe that the Director of the Census has made it perfectly clear that everybody who applies for one of these places is entitled to and will receive proper consideration. Every applicant will be allowed to take the test examination, and everyone, regardless of politics, who passes a satisfactory test of his fitness for the position will be considered in making up the list of enumerators.

Mr. SIMS. Do you think the present method better than that of ten years ago, when you were in the Census Bureau?

Mr. LANGLEY. I think, as a result of our experience in taking the Twelfth Census, that we have been able to improve the law for the taking of the Thirteenth Census, based on that experience. I think the present law is better than the last law in some respects, and I think in years to come we will have a still better law, profiting by experience as we go along from census to census.

Mr. SIMS. Being able to speak from actual knowledge, having been in the Census Bureau at that time, upon an average were the schedules prepared by Democrats as well prepared as those prepared by Republicans?

Mr. LANGLEY. Well, I never heard any complaint against Democratic census employees as such, regarding the faithful and efficient discharge of duty.

Mr. SIMS. Then why should Democrats be excluded?

Mr. LANGLEY. I have heard of a good many being appointed, more than I, as a Republican, think should be appointed.

Mr. SIMS. Do you think the present President of the United States has the good of this country any more at heart, is any more honest and patriotic in determining the means by which to promote that good, than the late lamented President McKinley?

Mr. LANGLEY. I think both of them have been actuated by the very highest motives of patriotism and the purest sense of public duty.

Mr. SIMS. Do you regard the present methods in a State like Tennessee, in not having appointed a single Democrat, an improvement over President McKinley's course in dividing the appointments?

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, I am not going into details about what may have been done in Tennessee, but——

Mr. SIMS. That is a mere detail, is it?

Mr. LANGLEY. I am talking about the general policy of the present administration.

Mr. GAINES. I have been told a number of times that there are census supervisors, quite a number of them, appointed from many of the Southern States, who are Democrats. I want to be fair enough to the gentleman to say that if I had it to do I would not appoint Democrats, just as if there were a Democratic President I would not expect, much less request, the appointment of Republicans.

Mr. SIMS. Ten years ago I never requested one, and did not this time.

Mr. GAINES. But when you are requested to do so, you recommend Democrats, just as I would recommend Republicans if a similar request were made to me.

Mr. SIMS. What do you do it for?

Mr. GAINES. Is it not a fact that a number of Democratic census supervisors have been appointed in the Southern States?

Mr. SIMS. Why, I suppose where there are no suitable Republicans that has been done, or where there is no party benefit growing out of it.

Mr. GAINES. One reason why I do not approve of the appointment of Democratic supervisors in the Southern States is because when that courtesy has been paid to Democrats they have answered that the reason was because proper and even respectable Republicans could not be found there. That is the sort of partisan return that has been made to nonpartisanship on the part of a Republican administration.

Mr. SIMS. I said I supposed; I did not know.

Mr. GAINES. That is one reason why I would never have appointed one Democrat if I had had the appointment.

Mr. SIMS. How many Democratic supervisors have been appointed in West Virginia?

Mr. GAINES. None; and in my district a Republican was appointed upon my recommendation.

Mr. SIMS. Why did you recommend a Republican?

Mr. GAINES. Because I thought I should recommend people of my own party, and for the same reason that the gentleman from Tennessee did and always will recommend Democrats when he has the opportunity.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from West Virginia does not claim, then, that he made his appointment without reference to party interest or party feeling or party reward?

Mr. GAINES. On the contrary, "the gentleman from West Virginia" asserts that he made his recommendation with reference to the Republicanism as well as the high qualifications of the person appointed as supervisor.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if he is in a different class from that occupied by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]?

Mr. GAINES. I do not undertake to classify the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], whom I know very well and with whom my association has been most satisfactory.

Mr. SHERLEY. He classified himself by saying that all of these appointments were to be made without regard to politics at all, and that he had had nothing to do with getting Republicans appointed to positions.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not say that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I so understood the gentleman. If he has been getting appointments, I am glad to know it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My contention was that the census would be nonpartisan.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh!

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I concede that all people in this country are Republicans, Democrats, or Populists; that they belong to some party.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am glad to know that the gentleman is not being neglected or ignored.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I thank the gentleman for the concern he manifests for my interests.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from West Virginia talks just as I know he feels and just as I feel. I would recommend a Democrat for appointment. In the first place, of course, he must be competent. That is first to be considered; but where there are men equally competent in both parties, the gentleman from West Virginia has the courage to tell the naked truth about it, and not say that he recommended Republicans because he thought Republicans as such could take a better nonpartisan census than Democrats could, as such. My fight is altogether on the sham and false pretense there is about this matter. The truth is, the census is being taken upon a partisan basis; that is, the agents, the supervisors, and the enumerators are being selected because they are Republicans and not because they are better qualified to take the census than Democrats in the same locality.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LANGLEY. From what the gentleman stated, I think he left the impression on the committee that an invitation to come to the Census Office ten years ago was extended to him every time he went there to seek an appointment. I think I ought to say that while the gentleman was invited, perhaps, the first time that he came there, as soon as he found the way there and learned how to get appointments he thereafter came without invitation, and very frequently, much oftener than most Members of the House came. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will state that I was written to to make a recommendation, and it was a perfect surprise to me, but I made it. Five persons were appointed on my recommendation, or at least they were appointed and I recommended them. Now, then, when I wanted to get them promoted or get an increase of salary I went a number of times, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] made me believe that they were going to do the best thing in the shortest possible time, but they kept deferring the matter, and it was slow coming, and I did go a number of times.

But finally they all got out but one. I am not complaining. Nobody will question the motive of President McKinley or of the present President of the United States; but what intelligent man, that is willing to be fair and square with himself, will claim that in order to obtain a fair, nonpartisan census it should be done by one political party? The way to make it nonpartisan is to do it through nonpartisan agents. Mr. McKinley thought it was best that it should be done by nonpartisan appointments, and he followed that out. The present President thinks differently, and he has a right to his opinion.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman from Tennessee and I seem to have no quarrel whatever on this proposition; that he and I would without any pretense whatever pursue the same course, and recommend, each of us, for appointment men of his own political faith. But I want to ask the gentleman this question: Whether or not, as a matter of fact, a number of Democratic census supervisors were appointed in the Southern States by this Republican administration? And I am the more anxious to have a confirmation by an affirmative answer, if that be the fact, for the reason that it has been said, I am told, in some of the Southern States to local Republicans, in whose neighborhood Democrats have been appointed, that it was an admission by the Republican administration that proper men, suitable men, could not be found in the Republican party to take the census.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know in what States Democrats have been appointed in the South. And I do not know the alleged reason for it. I am told in Kentucky there has not a single Democrat been appointed. There has not a single one been appointed in Tennessee. Has any been appointed in Missouri?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No.

Mr. SIMS. There have been no Democrats appointed in Indiana, as I am told. Now, why is it that they did not appoint a Democrat or some Democrats in the great States of Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Indiana, but appoint them in such States as Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina, if it was not for the fact that it was thought that no political benefits in those Southern States would arise from the appointment of Republicans?

Mr. GAINES. Does the gentleman think that the appointment of a few Democrats in Southern States is a political advantage to the Republican party? He must believe either that the Republicans down there have very little care about the appointments for themselves or else that the Democrats in that neighborhood are mighty easily seduced away from their party.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, the gentleman is using language that is mere claptrap. Democrats can not be seduced away from their party by a little office like that. Can the gentleman tell me whether there have been any Democratic supervisors appointed in West Virginia?

Mr. GAINES. The political history of West Virginia shows that no such thing is necessary to hold Republicans. The political history there——

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman—and he can tell me, for he is on the inside—why Democratic supervisors are appointed in Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina?

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman asks me why Democratic supervisors are appointed anywhere, I want frankly to confess that I do not know the answer.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect a personal answer. I thought the gentleman was on the inside and was speaking for the administration.

Mr. GAINES. Oh, I am not sufficiently on the inside to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, it must be plain to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES], or to anybody else, that we must judge of the motive of an act from the results that naturally follow it. The gentleman knows, and I know and everybody else knows, that it is a benefit, politically speaking, so far as getting out a vote and party work is concerned, to have these enumerators of your own party. There is not a particle of question about that. Therefore you do have the enumerators all Republicans in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, doubtful States, sometimes going one way and sometimes another way; but in the Democratic States, where it is impossible for you to win with your enumerators or otherwise, then you adopt your nonpartisan methods by appointing Democrats in such States as Mississippi. Why should there be any pretense that the object and purpose of these appointments was not to have political effect—and a good political effect—for the Republican party? Not that you expected to take a different census or violate the law, but are not these enumerators a very valuable part of a political organization, and do they not constitute a valuable force which will come in with great benefit in the next and subsequent elections?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield that the gentleman may ask a question.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I only want to ask the gentleman one question. If this is to be a nonpartisan census, as is greatly paraded in the Indiana press and elsewhere——

Mr. GAINES. To whom does the gentleman address his question?

Mr. BARNHART. To the gentleman from West Virginia. How does it occur that in the State of Indiana, where there are two Republican Congressmen and eleven Democrats, the two Republican Congressmen appoint the census enumerators in their own districts, and the Republican United States Senator appoints them in the eleven Democratic districts?

Mr. GAINES. Well, Mr. Chairman, my answer to that is this: I can not see any relation whatever between a nonpartisan census and the appointment of Republicans or Democrats. Certainly, the appointees are bound to be either Republicans or Democrats or Populists; they can not be people without any political meaning, and they might all be of one party and the census be perfectly nonpartisan.

I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], however, that if the appointments are all from one party, then the appointments to office are not nonpartisan, and he and I further agree that we would appoint people of our own party. But the gentleman from Tennessee said, and that was the reason I interrupted him, that he believed there ought not to be any pretense of appointment of people of the other party, and I wished to find out whether it was not a fact that Democrats were appointed in the Southern States, and I think the debate has developed the fact that there are many Democratic supervisors who have been appointed in Southern States under this Republican administration.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy the floor any longer than simply to say that nobody has charged that the object and purpose of the making of these appointments was to have the census schedules made out other than correctly, but the charge is made, and it is absolutely true, that the political benefit or effect that the Republican party will get by appointing Republican census officials is very great; that that was the object and the purpose of appointing them, and not that the appointing power thought the Republican census enumerators would do better work or render more efficient results.

Now, if you all will do like the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] and tell the plain truth about political matters, we will have no quarrel with you. Go on and appoint your Republicans and be responsible for them, but do not pretend that you have no party benefit in view—not directly in taking the census, but in benefits to the party as a whole, and then we will bury the hatchet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address a question or two to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] if he will permit me to do so, because I know he is very well informed. How many supervisors of the census did we have ten years ago—what was the total number?

Mr. LANGLEY. I think there were 300. I think the act providing for the Twelfth Census limited the number to 300. That is my recollection.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Can the gentleman state to us about how they were divided as between political parties?

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman means how many each party had?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; how many Democrats and how many Republicans?

Mr. LANGLEY. I can not reply as to how many; I know quite a number were Democrats—more than the Democrats were entitled to, I think.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Were not the places substantially divided between the political parties?

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, no; not at all. But in the Southern States there were quite a number of Democratic supervisors appointed.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman this question, then: If it has not been the invariable rule, not departed from before, that the supervisors of census be divided between the two parties in all the States?

Mr. LANGLEY. It has not been the rule. The gentleman is mistaken about that. There was a sort of general understanding that, particularly in the southern section of the country, some of the supervisors were to be named by Members of the minority party.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his information, but I want to say that his information is not as accurate as I expected. He lacks a knowledge of the facts which I thought he possessed.

Mr. LANGLEY. For the information of the gentleman and as explanatory of my lack of accurate recollection of the exact facts, I think I ought to say that I was not in charge as appointment clerk of the selection of supervisors. They had a separate division which had direct charge of that work.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I appreciate that, and I appreciate the answer the gentleman has made me; but I want to say the Director of the Census himself told me, both the present director and the one who recently left the office, that it had been invariably the rule, from the time of the first census, to make this work strictly nonpartisan.

Mr. LANGLEY. All over the country?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Possibly not in every State, but substantially, and I merely want to suggest that that rule has been departed from——

Mr. MANN. They are doing this now; the supervisor in Chicago is a Democrat.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, it is a mere sham——

Mr. MANN. It is not a sham, and the gentleman will not make the statement that a statement I make is a sham; it is a fact.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. What is your statement again; let me understand it, and——

Mr. MANN. That the man appointed in Chicago is not a Republican politician; he is not a Republican.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Is he a Democrat?

Mr. MANN. We call him a Democrat.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, that is all right, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. We charge he is a Democrat.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman can not tell me what to say. I will determine that for myself. I do not care who says it, how often it is repeated, from how many housetops it is shouted, I say all this talk about a nonpartisan census is a mere sham.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana some time ago that the gentleman is not confining himself to the bill under consideration.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman ought to take his seat; the Chair ruled on that once and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] is out of order.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire a ruling, because there is a misunderstanding——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. How often do you wish to get a ruling on this, I want to know.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's discussion is not confined to the provisions of the bill now under consideration. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri, I do not want to take him off the floor——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. You can not do that anyhow. The gentleman can make his statement, but he can not take me off the floor.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me, his time is about expired, but there is a misunderstanding in this committee whether or not this question has been ruled upon, and I hope the gentleman will allow a ruling to be made regarding it so there can be no controversy in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled, and the Chair states, that as far as the Chair is informed, and he has read the rule carefully, that he knows no difference between calendar Wednesday and any other day when the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say just now that this census is being taken, and ought to be taken, in a perfectly nonpartisan, nonpolitical manner, and that this statement of the gentleman from Indiana was intended to apply not only to the appointment of supervisors, but also to the appointment of enumerators.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have not got started with my presentation of the matter; not at present.

Mr. REEDER. But I would like to ask you a question before you get started.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to the gentleman later. I want to call the attention of this House and the country to a rule promulgated by the administration that is being applied throughout this country, or at least a great section of it, which can not possibly fail to have a disastrous effect upon the taking of an accurate and careful census of the country, and that is the rule that in certain parts of the country, where a certain portion of the inhabitants are black, we shall have negro enumerators, regardless of their ignorance or of anything else.

It seems that this administration has determined that in certain States in the South, although assurances to the contrary were repeatedly given during the last session of this Congress, where there is a certain large proportion of negro population we shall have negro enumerators simply because there are many negroes to be enumerated. Now, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that a rule like that can not be defended on the idea of obtaining an accurate and efficient census force. It is well known to all of us who hail from that section of the country that the inevitable effect of this rule is not to promote an efficient census, but, on the contrary, to keep us from getting an efficient census. It is true that this rule is not so distasteful and not so hateful to us in the South as it would otherwise be, because of the fact that the administration gives it out that these negro enumerators are to take the census of negroes only, and that they are not to go into a single white family to take the census. Therefore we will not be accused of having any racial prejudice on this question when we say to you that a rule that, where there are a certain amount of black people, you are going to have both white and black enumerators, one to take the census among the white people and one among the black people, was never conceived in any desire to promote an efficient census. On the contrary, it cuts in two the compensation of the enumerators, and its very effect and tendency is to cause a worse census than we would otherwise have. And we all know there, as it is known all over the country, that this rule was born not of any desire to give the country a complete, accurate, and reliable census, but out of the political necessities of the Republican party, which must rally to its support in the approaching election, in the doubtful States of the West and North and East, this negro vote in solid phalanx. And they have undertaken to do it at the expense of an accurate census, and at the expense of a complete census, and by an operation that will give us hundreds and hundreds of inefficient, inaccurate, and almost useless enumerators throughout the South.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just one moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. With pleasure.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the further effect and apparent purpose of that rule also to aid the present administration in securing the votes of those States in the coming Republican convention?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly the purpose, in my opinion, is not only to rally the colored vote in the doubtful States, but also to rally the colored delegates in the next Republican national convention and try to overcome some of the——

Mr. GAINES. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman here, but——

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad indeed to have the gentleman do it.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman is absolutely mistaken about there being any such purpose. Let me tell him——

Mr. HARDWICK. About what purpose?

Mr. GAINES. About the purpose and object. The object is to get a completer census. The idea is to get colored men and have a complete census made of that portion of the population which might be skipped by a white man.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say to the gentleman that you will never get a complete census in the South by any such means as that, because we have not people there of that class in large enough numbers and of sufficient intelligence to do it. White men can and would do the work much better in all cases.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask if the purpose of that is not more partisan even in that it tends to help the Republicans out and help the administration branch of the Republicans?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has made the statement that appointments of the census supervisors have been made with the view of creating Republican sentiment in various sections of the country, I think.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I did not say that. I said it was to rally the colored brother in States like Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Missouri, I expect, that you do this. You will not make any sentiment amongst the white people of the South by doing that, and, thank God, one of the effects of the action will be to kill the idea of building up any white Republican party in Dixie. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says the administration is making appointments merely for the purpose of building up the administration.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that certainly has something to do with it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it looks to me that a rule like that, that wherever you give positions to a certain number of black people, regardless of qualification, regardless of whether or not there are more competent white men that are applicants for the positions, it never could have been born of any desire to obtain a complete and accurate census, but was born of something at least entirely different from that, and not even connected remotely with it. Therefore I have been impelled to make these observations in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] in opening the debate, that this census was to be taken with a view of obtaining a complete, accurate, and impartial census, and everything that was done was being done along those lines. This is one instance, at least, where I know that is not true.

I tell you now if you want an honest and efficient census taken, and honest and efficient enumerators everywhere throughout the country, you will never accomplish that purpose by appointing a lot of negro enumerators in the South, even if they are going to operate among the negroes alone.

I am unalterably opposed to the appointment of any negro enumerators. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising to me, a business man, that the system and the boss are up in arms today and trying to get the attention of the people away from panic conditions of Wall street. According to newspaper accounts, February 1 we had a bank failure in New York of Fiske & Robinson, with liabilities of seven millions and with assets of less than a million, following the failure of J. M. Fiske & Co., whose liabilities were over a million, and Bradstreet's report showing 275 failures in the last week and total failures of 11,845 last year, with liabilities of over one hundred and forty millions, and call money going as high as 6 per cent and over.

There was an election yesterday in the sixth district of Missouri to fill the place made vacant by the death of that great Democratic leader, Judge De Armond. The bosses made a strenuous fight, but the people, by the largest majority ever given in the district, repudiated the system and elected a Jeffersonian Democrat who stands for government by the people. The issue was whether legislation here should be controlled by the people through their chosen representatives or by the bosses who repress the representatives of the people. The issue was decided against the bosses by an overwhelming majority, which is the highest honor the people out there could have shown to the memory of De Armond, whose voice was always raised and whose vote was always cast in behalf of constitutional freedom. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to get the floor for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri was recognized for an hour and has used all of that time but three minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 58.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I reserve my time. I hoped general debate would close so that we could have a vote on this bill this afternoon. It is very important, but I do not see very much prospect of it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, if I am recognized in my own right, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have had a great many suggestions on the other side of the aisle about making appointments of the supervisors of the census. We have heard it stated that all of these appointments are made for the purpose of making political capital for the administration and for continuing control of the delegates from the Southern States in the next Republican convention. I think that the appointments made by the administration in the State of Georgia, from which State the gentleman who last spoke comes, were made with a view to securing an honest census of all the people in the Southern States and not a few; and it makes no difference whether a man is black or white who is appointed to take this census, provided he has the qualifications to perform the work well and has the honesty of purpose to do the work in accordance with the rules laid down by the law. What is sought to be obtained is an honest census of the people, and that census secured in an honest way.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. HARDWICK. If that is the purpose, why is it that if a white man stands a better examination for census enumerator, and would make a better one, you prefer to appoint a black man, who stands a worse examination?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not prepared to admit the truth of the statement implied by the gentleman's question. I am prepared to say that in the appointment of the supervisors in the city of Chicago, which contains ten congressional districts, seven of which are represented on this floor by Republicans, no Republican Representative from that city was consulted as to who should be appointed supervisor of the census in that great metropolis. No Republican Representative from that city had his views sought on the question of who should be selected. No Republican Representative on this floor from that city sought to give advice as to who should be appointed. The administration selected the man it thought best qualified, and every man and woman appointed by this supervisor of census so far has been appointed without political influence, without bias of any kind or nature; and the men and the women who have been appointed to the subordinate positions under this man have been appointed because of the qualifications possessed by them for the duties they are to perform. I object to the insinuation made by the gentleman from Georgia that because men are black they are not qualified to perform the duties which they have been appointed to perform in the Southern States. The color of a man's skin makes no difference in this proud free land of ours. We are all Americans, whether we be black or white. A man should be taken as a man regardless of color or creed; and I glory in the independence manifested by this administration in the selection of the men for this work regardless of color or what their politics may be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, from having listened to this debate, I have reached the conclusion that perhaps somebody on this side of the House ought to make a few purely unimpassioned remarks upon the subject now before the House, nonpartisan in character. [Laughter.]

The perennial or, rather, periodical exultation of Democrats, and complaints are being aired over this innocent little census bill.

Summarizing the proposition of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], he arraigns the Republican party of this country for not having passed a law or made a rule to prohibit any colored man in the South from being an enumerator. His complaint rests on that alone.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will have to wait a little longer. Then I will yield to him. He thinks that is a serious matter, but he concludes his remarks by saying that the failure of the Republican party to do that thing will unite the white people of the South in the Democratic ranks.

I have some recollection of a census that was taken away back in 1880. At that time there were four times as many Democratic white votes cast in the Gulf States in electing Congressmen as there are to-day in electing them. Republicans were elected then; not now. There was a complaint made on this floor similar to the one made by the gentleman from Georgia now—that is, that Republicans in Mississippi and other States were going to take the census, and that they would return too many colored people, and show that they were entitled to too many Members of Congress, because they were then electing Republicans. But after thirty years we are met with the claim that we want a census, the purpose of which shall be, I have no doubt, to get more colored people returned as residents of those States, in order that more white Democrats may get into Congress without their votes.

I do not agree with gentlemen on either side, as far as I understand them, on the subject of the policy of President Taft with reference to the taking of the census. I do not understand that there is any order of the President or any rule or regulation of the Director of the Census to supervisors requiring them to select nonpartisans for enumerators, and there was no order that nonpartisans should be selected for supervisors. If anybody could furnish proof of anything of that kind I should regard it as the most extraordinary thing that has ever occurred in these extraordinary times in politics. If I had the power I would not appoint a man even for an enumerator in a small enumerating district if he was so much of a nonentity, so absolutely worthless and trifling, that he did not know any party, and did not belong to one. [Applause.] I would sooner take Democrats all the time than get such a poor, shiftless, worthless fellow as that; and there should be no purpose to select that kind of nonpartisan. What the administration requires is that a Republican or a Democrat who may be a supervisor or an enumerator, or otherwise connected with taking the census, shall not perform partisan duty while engaged in taking the census. The supervisor in my district held a position on a central committee. He resigned, so that there should not be any appearance of his acting in connection with politics during the time he was performing the duties of supervisor of the census.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman is correct in his theory as to the nonpartisan character of this census, why is it that instead of going to the Director of the Census or the Secretary of the Interior to assist him in making these selections, the President goes to the Postmaster-General, a member of his Cabinet, who happens to be the active head of the Republican machinery?

Mr. KEIFER. I have heard that said so often on the floor that I am inclined to think some of the gentlemen who put such questions believe the statement to be true, but I do not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. KEIFER. I deny it so far as the final determination of any census supervisor or enumerator in the United States is concerned.

Mr. HARDWICK. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that none of the census supervisors were appointed on the advice and recommendation of Postmaster-General Hitchcock?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know how many times he may have been consulted and talked to about it, but they were all appointed by the President of the United States on the recommendation of the Director of the Census.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I want to say that I went to see the President of the United States about the appointment of a supervisor in my district, and he said I must confer with Mr. Hitchcock, the Postmaster-General. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I did not do it, however.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that in times gone by a great many Democrats even were consulted before appointments were made. I would like to know how many Democrats on the other side of this House went to the President in the last few months and begged him to appoint Democratic supervisors in their districts. I am told that nearly a hundred have gone and done that thing, and now they are here complaining because they did not get partisan Democrats appointed. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I am one who did not do it.

Mr. MACON. And I want to say that here is another Democratic Member that did not ask the President to appoint a supervisor for his district.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I will take the word of these gentlemen. Only two so far have entered a denial.

Mr. BOEHNE. I want to say that I did not go.

Mr. KEIFER. One more—three in all. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, speaking further on the nonpartisan character of the census, I am quite sure I can make an accurate statement, and that is that there will be no census takers appointed anywhere in the United States until after some form of examination is had for them to show their qualifications to take a census. Moreover, in making the appointments all through the North, at least, there will be no discrimination among census takers who shall show the qualifications because they are Democrats or anything else.

There are some Socialists in my district who may be census takers. There is nothing partisan about that. But they would not appoint a Democratic chairman of a committee or a Democratic ward politician. They would exclude them as they would Republican chairmen and committeemen in making the appointments unless they resigned their little political offices. President Taft's order requires this.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am opposed to appointing negroes to take the census. Does the gentleman believe that negroes ought to be appointed to take the census in the South?

Mr. KEIFER. If they are well qualified.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, the gentleman disapproves the President's policy when he said he would not appoint negroes to office in the South.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not understand that the President ever said so. If he said so, he ought not to have said it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did not he say it in his inaugural address?

Mr. KEIFER. I think not. On the contrary, he said in his inaugural address that he would "exercise a careful discretion" in appointing negroes to office. I believe that anybody who is qualified has a right to be appointed to an office in our Government. Those who are the humblest are the people whom we should take more care of in preserving their rights, political as well as all others.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did the gentleman from Ohio ask for negro enumerators in his own district?

Mr. KEIFER. I have not asked for a Republican or a Democrat to be appointed as such, or a negro.

Mr. HEFLIN. Has the gentleman asked for the appointment of any negro in his district?

Mr. KEIFER. Probably I have not asked for the appointment of colored men, but I am putting this where the rule of the President puts it, on qualifications. He requires the Census Bureau to be carefully administered in a nonpartisan way.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman please answer my question? Has the gentleman from Ohio requested that any negro in his district be appointed a census enumerator?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think there have been any appointments made in my district of census takers, white or colored.

Mr. HEFLIN. Has the gentleman requested that any negro be appointed?

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir; I have not requested anybody to be appointed, and I told the gentleman that before. I am working under this nonpartisan presidential rule [laughter on the Democratic side] requiring enumerators to be selected without regard to party on their showing proper qualifications, and that is what the rule authorizes; they may be good Republicans or Democrats, or what not. The colored man is not barred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been drawn into this debate very unwillingly. I want it quite well understood that I am a partisan when it comes to partisan things, but when we are doing the public business I believe in forgetting it as far as possible; and if a man, be he Republican or Democrat, is put into office, he should fill it in the interest of the people and not in a partisan way.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the gentleman to speak of the administration's nonpartisan rule in appointing census takers, regardless of party. Does he understand that rule applied also to the appointment of supervisors?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think that rule was applied to them, except to this extent. No person was allowed to be appointed, under the order of the President, a supervisor who held any political office, even to that of chairman or member of a committee of any party.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that these supervisors in all the States except the Southern States were to be Republican?

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir; that is not true either.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, I will make this statement. I think I can enlighten the gentleman. In my individual district a man, a Republican, appointed supervisor, died, and afterwards I was inquiring as to whether his successor had been appointed, and the census director told me he had not, but said he would like to have me give my opinion on some good man.

Mr. KEIFER. That was proper.

Mr. HAMLIN. But he said, "Understand he must be a Republican." [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. Very good.

Mr. SABATH. And the gentleman found that it was a very hard thing to do. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMLIN. I told him I had no recommendation to make.

Mr. KEIFER. A competent man was the thing desirable, and, of course, he would ask the gentleman who might know.

Mr. HAMLIN. He did not say that he must be a competent man. He said that he must be a Republican. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. He must be competent, of course, for that is the rule all the way through. Mr. Chairman, I think that is all I desire to say on this subject, and I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a little along this line of discussion on the situation of Democratic supervisors as developed by the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] who has just taken his seat professes to be moving under the nonpartisan administration now in effect at the White House. I wish to say something about how that nonpartisan administration seems to work. The President has announced a number of times that his administration of this census should be nonpartisan, and then it was understood that in those States where the Republican party had no hope of life or resurrection, where it could do no possible harm to the Republican party, there would be some Democrats appointed to take the census. Apparently, this was in line with the hope expressed in many places that the President might build up a Republican party in the South, and for that purpose it seemed to be well calculated; but as to its administration being nonpartisan, I want to call the attention of the Members to the fact that in doubtful States, in doubtful districts, no Democrat has been appointed supervisor of the census. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Take a State like Missouri or some other State that seems to be doubtful, Kentucky or Tennessee—those States are held exclusively for the purposes of the administration in its distribution of the pie in order to increase the strength of the party. But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the worst. I like nonpartisan methods sometimes, and I could not help being a little enthused and a little exalted by the apostrophe of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the glorious independence of the present administration and occupant of the White House when he was replying to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

But what does that glorious independence amount to? It amounts to this, that in Texas and in Georgia, where there is only the hope of building up a little to the tail of Republicanism that is left there now, some supervisors are made Democrats, but in those districts where Democrats in my State are made supervisors they are, nevertheless, instructed that certain persons under the direction of the national administration will call to their attention certain colored brethren who must be appointed enumerators in certain precincts and districts to enumerate the negroes. Is there anything partisan in that? Is there any politics in that? Yes; the politics consists in this, that the present administration, in naming the enumerators in these precincts, will thereby control the state convention, and it is not only partisan politics, but it is factional politics within partisan politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] By that means the delegations in the national convention from the Southern States will be controlled through the Census Bureau in the appointments of these enumerators in the little districts or in the small precincts where there is a Democratic supervisor; and that is about the only political use the administration could possibly make of the census appointments there.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague whether he knows that the referee in Texas is the man who makes all the appointments, and if the referee is or is not in charge of the Republican machinery and sees that it is oiled and keep going?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that that question suggests its true answer, which is that the referee (that is the title by which he is generally designated) distributes all the official pie controlled by the federal administration. As to the census, special presidential agents I suppose you might call them, have to appoint these little precinct enumerators. For my district, and I presume for the whole State, there are two of them—one at Paris, 100 miles north of my district, and the other at Houston, 50 miles south. Now, why in the name of God the administration would want to tell the supervisor of my district to go down to Houston to get advice about who to appoint enumerators, and then to go up to Paris to get the name of another man to tell him whom he should appoint in these districts down in the river bottom, where there are few people, except negroes, I can not see, unless it be for this reason, that the state convention when it meets to send delegates to your Republican convention will be dominated from the Census Bureau appointments, and these two agents, one at Paris and the other at Houston, are holding the reins and driving the team of the political wagon. Of course, that may not be partisanship. The supervisor in my district is a Democrat and is instructed to eschew politics when he is in office, and I have advised him to do it, but somebody higher than he is not eschewing politics. Somebody higher than the supervisor of the census in my district is playing politics with the census taking in the State of Texas and all through the South.

Now, I do not know how many votes in the Republican convention will come up from south of Mason and Dixon's old line, but every one of them in my State comes under the leading string of the distributors of the spoils, and I have thought there ought to be another office created in the United States, and that office ought to be advisor for the Republican party in States and districts where it has nobody living that can advise it. The office referred to by my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is not named by the Constitution or laws, but is known as "referee." [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] My district seems to be in that attitude. We have nobody in the district that can advise them, but there is a man at Houston and another man at Paris who can advise about this matter.

In further reply to my colleague [Mr. SLAYDEN], I will say that when the present administration first came in the newspapers were full of the idea of a new deal for the South. Her people were to have voice in the filling of the little local federal offices. The President himself, in his inaugural address, seemed to hold out this hope. But—

Oh, ever thus, from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay.

Time passes, a little time and we find the same old referee doing business at the same old stand in Texas; the same spoils and pie system. The officiousness of these agents in these census matters is in no way different from that of the referee in connection with all other federal offices in Texas and, I presume, in the whole South. Our fathers, the Constitution builders, forgot to provide for the referee, his title or emoluments, but he is the most important Republican functionary in the South. No federal officer is appointed till he nods his head in approval.

It seems the President and postal authorities here at the seat of government have surrendered their right to appoint collectors of customs and internal revenue and postmasters of all classes to the referee, who can not know local conditions throughout a great State like Texas. Yet a man who resides on the Red River, in extreme north Texas, absolutely appoints every small postmaster, even as far south as Cameron County, on the Gulf of Mexico. The reason of his being is not hard to find. An election approaches and delegates must be chosen. The southern delegates to Republican national conventions are usually influenced by two things—federal office and cold cash. The referee is the dispenser of these favors. He is the gatherer in chief of delegates.

I think it is not unlikely that the fact that he is useful in this way accounts for the failure of the President to redeem the promise made in his Georgia speech that he would abolish this iniquitous, offensive, and extra-legal functionary. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] may sing and have sung the glories of the present nonpartisan administration, but who will sing the glories of the referee? The carpet-bag days are gone, but a rose by another name smells just as sweet. Georgia hung enraptured over the words of the President in 1909, but let those who will take a sniff at the rose, the referee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may be now closed and we may proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment on line 11 to the paragraph just read.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest this is all one section and that the gentleman had better withhold his amendment until the section has been read. The gentleman's amendment is an amendment to section 8 of the original act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading, as the bill is in one section.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I will offer my amendment at the close of the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at the proper time.

The Clerk proceeded with and finished the reading of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 11, on page 3, insert:
"And to collect authoritative statistics relating to farmers' mutual insurance companies, showing the amount of such insurance and the insurance results accomplished."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the point of order just now, although I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order; but I want to refer to the merits of the amendment and ask the Clerk to read some resolutions in support of it. There are many mutual insurance companies engaged in carrying insurance among the farmers, insuring stock, insuring houses, barns, and grain; in fact, insuring practically everything connected with the farm. A similar line of mutual insurance is carried by mutual insurance companies in the cities, and I think that it may be of interest to the country that this decennial census should ascertain the amount and success of that insurance, so that the country may know the facts as to the cost of the insurance and if it is a safe insurance. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have read in my time that portion of this letter inclosed with pencil marks, which includes the resolutions adopted by the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Association, of Columbus, Kans., at its last annual meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the article referred to in the time of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. These resolutions, I will state, were adopted by the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Association in southeastern Kansas, at Columbus, Kans., recently, and sent to me by the secretary of that association, Mr. G. W. Snyder.

The Clerk read as follows:

At its last annual meeting the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Association, of Columbus, Kans., an organization of farmers of southeast Kansas, adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas authoritative statistics are very desirable showing results accomplished by farmers' mutual insurance companies; and

"Whereas the Director of the Census declares that there is a lack of authority in his department to make such a compilation, but that Congress will be asked for such authority: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That our Representative in Congress and both our United States Senators be instructed and requested to give their full support to such legislation as will enable or direct the Director of the Census to make a full compilation of such statistics at the coming enumeration of census of farmers' mutual insurance companies and other farmers' cooperative associations; and it is further Resolved, That our secretary be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to our Congressman and both our United States Senators."

Mr. CAMPBELL. These resolutions indicate the necessity for information among the farmers as to the extent and effect of that class of insurance. Where associations are engaged in that sort of business it seems to me that it is wise to enumerate the number of insurance companies of that character, the amount of insurance carried, the losses paid, and the cost to the insurer, and to get such other information as the Director of the Census should deem proper in regard to the amount and the nature of the business of that class of insurance. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not make the point of order, although I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order. It is germane to this bill, and the bill itself is an amendment to the law authorizing the Thirteenth Decennial Census. The amendment I propose simply enlarges the scope of the work proposed by the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the Chair desires to hear anything on the point of order, I would like to submit a few suggestions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In the first place, this bill is a bill to amend section 8 of the original census act. The Chair takes notice of what the law is. All that is new in the bill is the proviso about the middle of page 4, and that is the only thing that is new in the bill; the other is law which is already existing, which the Chair is bound to take official notice of, so that really all that is before the Chair now is this proviso. In the second place, the proposition is not germane. The section deals with population, agriculture, mines, and mining, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas relates to insurance—altogether a different subject. Insurance has no relation to agriculture, it has no relation to agriculture necessarily, and it is no part of manufactures, it is no part of mining, it is a totally different enterprise. Now, so much for the point of order. I have some observations to submit upon the merits of the question when the point of order has been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is of the opinion that section 8 of the census law being presented here for amendment, the entire section is before the Committee of the Whole, being a part of the text of the bill as presented here for consideration. That being so, the matter of insurance is only adding another phase to the inquiries already provided for in the bill, to wit, population, agriculture, manufacture, and mining, and is no more foreign, for instance, to population than agriculture is to population, or manufacture is to population. So the Chair is of the opinion that it is germane to section 8 of the census law, which is presented here for consideration. Therefore, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words to the committee on the pending proposition. It is an exceedingly dangerous thing to propose a piece of legislation in relation to the census for consideration at this time on account of the liability of having all kinds of amendments hooked onto it. The permanent Census Office is charged with the duty of investigating the subject of insurance—the various kinds of insurance, fire, life, and, I think, casualty insurance. That office does that work during the interim between the decennial censuses.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That was the opinion of the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Company, of southeastern Kansas. They requested the Director of the Census to make an enumeration of the mutual insurance companies among farmers in the country, and he informed them that he had neither the authority or the money to make an enumeration of such companies as were indicated in the request.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know what requests were made or what information was given, but I do know that the Director of the Census several years ago made an investigation of the general subject of insurance, and if any amendment of the law is to be made at all, if the authority does not cover mutual fire insurance, there ought to be an amendment to the permanent census law and not to this. Now, gentlemen, I want to impress upon you this proposition. The decennial census was carefully limited to four principal inquiries, namely, population, agriculture, manufacture, and mining. Why? Because they were the most important subjects among all the rest, and it was deemed of vital importance to so limit and circumscribe the duty and the requirements of the Census Office, so that these investigations could be made with accuracy and dispatch and the report given to the public by the 1st day of July, 1912. Numerous meritorious projects have been submitted to the committee, and if they were all embodied in the bill it would practically break down the work. The work would be protracted to such an extent that the reports could not be prepared, tabulated, and published until they had largely lost their current value.

The office has everything it can do now. It can not take on any additional work and carry on these great investigations and be expected to give the public the results of the investigations while they are fresh. Now, that is the chief objection to this amendment. This investigation in relation to mutual insurance could be made, if it is to be made at all, in connection with the general investigation of the subject of insurance. It can not be made by the enumerators, it can not be made in connection with the population schedule, with the agricultural schedule, the manufacturing schedule, or the mining schedule. It will involve the creation of an additional division or bureau in the office. Nobody knows how much it will cost nor how long it will take.

Now, I ask, gentlemen, to let it go over until we have gotten through with this gigantic undertaking that is already on the shoulders of the Director of the Census. Let us finish the four principal inquiries, do that right, and give the country reports while they are fresh, and then take up the mutual insurance and other things that may be deemed of sufficient importance to justify additional legislation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, nothing that has been said convinces me that it is either inexpedient or unwise to agree to the amendment proposed to this bill. If we should wait until a law is specially enacted to make an enumeration of mutual insurance companies, we shall probably have no such law. It is important, because, as stated a moment ago, there are many of these mutual insurance companies throughout the country now doing business. What the farmers want to know is how the business is carried on, the extent to which it is carried on, and the success with which it is carried on, so that they can determine the wisdom of availing themselves of that class of insurance.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if there should not be included an investigation of regular insurance of all the various classes?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am informed that the Director of the Census does that now, but claims he has no authority to include mutual insurance companies.

Mr. GOULDEN. I do not see any reason why they should not be compelled to give that information. They are conducting business on purely insurance lines, and they ought to be included with the others.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think the observations of the gentleman from New York are entirely correct. I think they ought to be; but, unfortunately for this branch of insurance, they have not been enumerated. The extent to which insurance of that kind has been carried on has not been made known.

Mr. GOULDEN. How much would it add to the expense, probably, to take that census?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, it ought not to add much.

Mr. GOULDEN. How much would it add to the burden of the work of the Census Bureau?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very little. There is but one insurance company of this kind in four or five or perhaps a dozen counties. It ought not to take the enumerator long——

Mr. GOULDEN. Of course, the gentleman is aware that there are a large number of these companies?

Mr. CAMPBELL (continuing). To make an enumeration of a congressional district. I say that the supervisor in every congressional district ought to be able by one day's work of a competent man to find out how much insurance is carried, how many members there are in the association, how many losses there were, and whether or not the losses have been met, and the cost to the insurer in each instance.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if that information can not now be obtained by reference to the reports of the state insurance commissioners?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They ought to be able to secure it in that way, but in many instances it is not available in the state insurance departments. The success of this class of insurance in Kansas can not be known in New York except by obtaining the reports of the insurance commissioner of that State, and the farmers in New York may have mutual insurance associations which are a success in New York, and we know nothing about it in Kansas. It would be a benefit to the farmers in both States to know these facts.

Mr. GOULDEN. All these insurance companies report to the commissioner of insurance in New York.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They may report to the insurance commissioner in New York, but the reports are not usually available to the farmers in Kansas, Iowa, or Arkansas.

Mr. GOULDEN. They can be obtained very readily.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no doubt; and so can many other things, if one goes to the trouble; but if that information was collated, as contemplated by this amendment, then the information would be available to everybody in all sections of the country, with but little trouble.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask, What value are these statistics? I am a member of a farmers' mutual insurance company in my own county, and we do not care a continental what the companies in other counties or in other States or districts are doing. We know what our insurance costs, and we contribute toward the payment. We do not know what benefit it would be to know what it is costing elsewhere.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will tell you what benefit you obtain from it. Do you think that you are getting this insurance cheaper than other insurance?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We think so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But there are other counties in Indiana that do not have that kind of insurance and do not know anything about how successful it is in your county.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Do not assume anything of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, if the society or association to which the gentleman from Indiana belongs is a success, it would be an inducement to the farmers in Wyoming or in Arkansas or in Kansas to organize a similar society. If they do have losses, and it costs less to the insurer, we ought to know it out in Kansas, and we can only know that by having just the kind of a report made that is contemplated by the amendment I have proposed. I am as anxious as the gentleman from Indiana that the branches proposed to be covered in the taking of the census should be concluded as speedily as possible, and I do not fear the work proposed would delay reports on the principal work to be undertaken. I therefore urge that the amendment be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "farm," in line 3, page 3, insert "the acreage of land under irrigation."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to burden the taking of the census with any unnecessary or unimportant features, neither do I think it would be wise to provide for new additional inquiries that would consume any considerable amount of time on the part of the enumerators.

But I call the attention of the committee to the fact that we provide, among other things, that the enumerators shall inquire as to the acreage of woodland on the farms. While that inquiry is being made inquiry can also be made without any considerable loss of time as to the amount of land on the farm, if any, that is under irrigation. It would not be necessary even to have all of the schedules carry this provision. Only those schedules which are distributed and used in the arid region need contain this provision if it is not deemed wise to have all of the schedules carry it. It is an important inquiry. The Government is engaged in irrigation. Private enterprise is engaged in irrigation. It is important that we should know how much irrigated land there is in this country; I think quite as important, perhaps, as that we should know how much woodland there is in the country. It is no more difficult to secure this information than it is to secure information as to the size of the farm or as to the amount of the farm which is timbered. It simply provides one additional question which can be readily answered, and which will give all the country information of very great value.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I received a communication from the Director of the Census this morning upon the subject of irrigation and irrigation establishments, and he said that the schedules already prepared required a census of the acreage of irrigated land. I have no objection to that provision going in the bill. We are already doing the work. It is not specifically provided in the law, but the director notified me this morning that the schedules already include that investigation.

Mr. MONDELL. In that case I am sure the committee will agree that the power ought to be specifically given to authorize the bureau to do what they contemplate doing.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming. It just goes a little further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that would be an amendment in the third degree, and therefore not in order. The gentleman from Wyoming will proceed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as there seems to be no objection to my amendment, I call for a vote on it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MONDELL, it was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 24, page 3, insert:
"Inquiry shall also be made as to the location and character of irrigation enterprises."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps it is not necessary to discuss this amendment at any length, owing to the fact that the chairman of the committee has suggested that the Director of the Census proposes to make this kind of inquiry; but it seems to me that it is important, if that be the fact, that he be authorized specifically by law to make it.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this is an amendment to the paragraph that provides that inquiry shall be made with regard to manufactures, mines, quarries, and so forth. There is a very considerable portion of the country in which there are a very few manufacturing industries, very few quarries, very few mines, and where the most important industry is that of irrigation. It is important not only that we should know the acreage under irrigation, which information we shall obtain through the amendment already adopted, but that inquiries be made as to the irrigation enterprises, their character, number, and location; and this inquiry can be made with but very little additional time or expense.

I doubt if it will add a penny to the expense of the taking of the census, because the same schedules which make the inquiries with regard to manufactures in a manufacturing district, in regard to mines in a mining district, in regard to quarries, will also provide for the information as to irrigation enterprises.

These irrigation enterprises are not very numerous; still it is important that we should know where they are, how they are conducted, who owns them, and generally the information in regard to them that we will have in regard to other industrial enterprises. It is important from the fact that, the Government being engaged in the work of irrigation, we should have information as to the projects with which the Government is not connected in order that we may compare the different projects as to their size and importance and as to the progress they are making. The plan of their operation and ownership, whether corporate, cooperative, or individual, also capitalization, cost of operation, and so forth.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Wyoming covers all irrigation plans and enterprises, big and little. I do not know how many there may be. I suppose that if some fellow with a shovel should dig an irrigation ditch from a river, or stream, or a natural body of water and take the water down to irrigate a garden or 40-acre farm, that would have to be investigated. I have no doubt the Federal Government keeps accurate statistics concerning all federal irrigation plants. The state government, I have no doubt, has accurate statistics respecting all state plants, but this is an uncertain field of investigating private irrigation schemes. I think it is of doubtful propriety, and I do not understand what particular benefit there can be in it.

The law will require the Director of the Census to take a census of the irrigated lands and the States in which they are located. Is not that all that is of any particular importance taking in connection with the federal plants and records that show correctly the capacity, and the state plants? Why is it necessary now to load up the Thirteenth Census with a subject like this that is altogether foreign at least from the four principal subjects of investigation that are to make up the decennial census? I do not think the amendment ought to be agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the Reclamation Service itself provides for making reports to Congress, and would not those reports be much better?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; and there ought not to be two reports by the Director of the Census; he ought not to be required to make an investigation of the Reclamation Service of federal irrigation plants and the state service, and then make duplicate reports. I think that is a very forcible argument.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman understands, of course, that the report made by the Reclamation Service only applies to federal irrigation and it does not apply to private projects.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Indiana informs us that under the law as it now is the private plants can be reported.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The acreage of the land irrigated is to be reported under the census as it now is.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And I think that is sufficient.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I rise to support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], because it authorizes the Census Bureau to make inquiries concerning the most important line of work in the United States concerning which no statistics are obtainable through the medium of the census. Practically one-half of the total area of the United States to-day depends for its very existence upon irrigation, so that there can be absolutely no question regarding the great importance of this branch of inquiry; and yet there is nowhere any compilation or compendium of statistics to which reference can be had to determine the magnitude and value of this institution and to determine the location of water and lands for the encouragement of settlement throughout the irrigated region.

I want to say that this is not a new subject sprung upon the Census Committee at this time, as has been objected to other amendments. This is a subject concerning which western Representatives, at the instance of their people, have been in correspondence and personal contact with the Director of the Census for some months. I myself have had several personal interviews with the Director of the Census, and I have interviewed the Director of the Reclamation Service. I went before the Committee on the Census with substantially the same amendment as is now offered by the gentleman from Wyoming, and at the suggestion of the committee I introduced in this House a joint resolution for the purpose of having the director make this line of inquiry, the committee having suggested that perhaps it would be better to proceed in that way than to attempt to amend this act.

The Director of the Census admits the great importance of this line of inquiry, but is of the opinion that he is not authorized to undertake it unless he is directed by Congress so to do. The schedules as they are now framed provide for ascertaining the acreage irrigated, the kind of crop grown, the quantity and value of the crop, and that is as far as the inquiry goes. What we want, gentlemen, is information concerning the plants which irrigate this land. We want to know the names of the irrigation enterprises; we want to know the location; we want to know their character and value, and all information of that nature.

Millions of dollars have been invested in irrigation enterprises throughout the West, while other millions are seeking investment. Investors ought to be furnished information and encouragement by a definite showing, officially made, as to the magnitude and merit of the interest into which their money is going; and I undertake to say that no greater stimulus could be given this beneficent, but profitable, work than a concise and complete tabulation by the Government showing the name, location, character, and value of the great network of irrigation systems upon and along the streams of the West. Let investors see the basis of their investments and let home seekers learn where and for what land and water are to be had. In no other way can the country be more thoroughly impressed with the great present and greater future value of this institution.

I want to say further that this amendment is introduced at the express request of the board of governors and the board of control of the National Irrigation Congress, a body which was the father of the Reclamation Service in this country and practically of all our western irrigation laws, including the work that is now being done by the Government to reclaim these arid lands; and which now endeavors to supply the desired information by an annual publication gotten out at its own expense and, therefore, necessarily limited—in fact, inconsiderable from every standpoint as compared with a national census publication. This board of governors and board of control have specially requested me, by reason of the fact that I happen to be the chairman of the legislative committee of the National Irrigation Congress, to undertake to secure this amendment, to the end that as speedily as possible this information shall be secured.

I will say further that this is not a temporary work. It was suggested to me by some gentlemen on the Census Committee that one reason this amendment should not be incorporated in the census act was because it was only temporary in character, but that is obviously a very mistaken view. It is of great magnitude now, but it will be of greater magnitude ten years hence, and still greater twenty years hence, growing forever with the growth of the West. People talk about the importance of the mining interest, and it is important, but I want to say that in the State of Colorado, which is recognized as the greatest mining State in the United States, the agricultural interests this past year were two or three times in excess of the value of the mining interests. In other words, the value of our mining output amounted to some fifty millions of dollars, while the value of the crop output exceeded one hundred millions. This great showing being almost wholly due to irrigation. Now, that condition does not apply alone to that State, but it applies to every State west of the one hundredth meridian.

Such facts as these ought to enable Members to determine at a glance and without further argument the great importance of collecting some information with reference to this institution.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREEN of Massachusetts having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 19548. An act prescribing certain provisions and conditions under which bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States may be issued, and for other purposes.

CENSUS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRUMPACKER), there were—ayes 45, noes 45.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. MONDELL and Mr. CRUMPACKER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 63

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of page 3 insert:

"That if any person or persons employed in the taking of this census, or who shall be charged with the responsibility of taking the same, shall knowingly falsify, or shall cause or permit to be falsified, any schedule or return, such person or persons shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $1,000."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think there will be no serious objection to this amendment if I may have the attention of the committee for a moment. I assume, and I have the right to assume, that every Member of this House wants a complete, fair, and honest census. There is a provision in the general law now making it a misdemeanor for any enumerator to falsify any reports that he makes, but there is nothing in the existing law that makes it a penalty or a crime, after that list reaches the Census Office, if it should be changed there in any way when it is being tabulated. No penalty is provided for the punishment of anyone who may be guilty of that offense. This amendment seeks only to make it a crime for anyone in the Census Office tabulating, or having in charge the tabulation, of these returns to falsify them or permit them to be falsified. I do not care to make any speech, but I only make that explanation. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read in the time of the gentleman from Indiana.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, that is all covered by law. There are numerous general statutes that prevent the falsifying of official or public records and reports, and my impression is it is covered in the census law. I have not had time to examine it critically.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the only section in the census law that could by any possibility cover it is section 22, and I think a careful reading of that section by the gentleman will convince him that it does not cover this alleged offense.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, does not the gentleman know that there are federal statutes, penal statutes, that make it a crime for any officer or person employed in a public capacity to falsify any report or any record of any kind or character, which probably carry a heavier penalty than the gentleman seeks to impose?

Mr. HAMLIN. That might be construed to apply only to official records.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, these are official records.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, not necessarily.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Here is what section 22 provides in addition to other provisions:

If he shall willfully and knowingly make a false certificate or a fictitious return and report he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction—

And so forth.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit, and I think the House will agree with me, that does not cover the point that is sought to be covered by this amendment.

Let me illustrate. Suppose the returns made by the enumerators show that only a certain per cent, say 50 per cent, of the people of this country own farms, and for a certain purpose the Census Office concludes it would make a better showing if the returns showed that 60 per cent owned their own farms, and in order to make this showing an order should be issued that in tabulating these reports, if the reports as actually filed do not show 60 per cent of the people of this country as farm owners, then they should be changed so that they will show that number. Then there ought to be a penalty imposed upon anybody who issued the order or made the change falsifying those returns.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the law does not already cover this sort of public misconduct, I am greatly mistaken. It can not be possible that this Government has gone along until this time without providing against official corruption of that character. I think this is one of those amendments that has originated in the excitement and superheated condition of the other side of the House this afternoon, so that gentlemen's imaginations were abnormally active, and they saw all manner of things in the nature of political bugaboos. Now, I think when the gentleman's head gets cool—and I do not speak with any sort of disparagement or disrespect—he will reach the conclusion that we have plenty of law to take care of all these things.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this subject has closed.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman——
The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. McCALL. I move to strike out the last word.
The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment in the third degree, and is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.
The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.
On a division (demanded by Mr. HAMLIN) there were—ayes 53, noes 78.
Mr. HAMLIN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.
Tellers were ordered.
The committee again divided, and the tellers (Mr. CRUMPACKER and Mr. HAMLIN) reported that there were—ayes 69, noes 82.
So the amendment was rejected.
Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which has been sent to the Clerk's desk, and I ask to have it read.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the close of line 11, on page 73:
"It shall also include the number of acres irrigated during the last calendar year, the value and kind of crops raised on such irrigated lands during said year, the amount of water used per acre thereon during said year for irrigation, and whether said water was obtained from state, national, or private works."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would simply provide for some additional information in regard to the irrigation in addition to that which is provided for by the amendment which has been just adopted. It could be obtained at the same time without any additional expense and would give information, in my judgment, of great value to the census upon the subject of irrigation.

The mere number of acres which are irrigated is rather a barren and unenlightening statement unless we know the value of the crop produced upon that land and the kind of crops produced upon it, and it would also be of immense value to the science and art of irrigation to know the amount of water with which these crops were produced. This amendment also would provide information as to whether this water was obtained from national, state, or private irrigation works. The enumerators in taking this census are required to ask a number of questions, or, at least, they will ask a number of questions, of every man engaged in agriculture. They have all the blanks prepared, and it will take an insignificant addition of time and expense to acquire this great information over what would be expended without it.

In the western country in the last few years millions of acres of land which supported no population at all, which was absolutely a desert so far as the support of human habitation was concerned, has been converted into the most thickly settled, the most populous agricultural region on the face of the earth. It has become the great paramount industrial and agricultural question of the West, and I say that it will be a reflection upon this great Government to take a census this year and not include in it information which would fully enlighten the people in regard to the progress of this great work and the result of it.

The information called for by this amendment is the number of acres irrigated, the kind and value of crops produced thereon, the amount of water per acre used and the sources from which that water is obtained, as to whether it is national, state, or private works. Now, that information being obtainable at an insignificant additional cost, it is obvious, I think, to the gentlemen of this House that the value to the entire people of this country—not only to the West, because the East is just as much interested in providing homes for its surplus population in the West as we are interested in building up prosperous agricultural communities there—would be very great.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is along the same line as those amendments which have been approved by the House this afternoon. It gives additional information which would make a complete and enlightening return upon the state of irrigation in this country.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. Only one section?
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Only one section. I move all debate be closed on this section and all amendments thereto in five minutes.
Mr. HARRISON. Will not the gentleman modify his resolution so as to allow us five minutes? We each have an amendment, and have been sitting here all day waiting our turn.
Mr. BOOHER. I would like to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in five minutes.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that he make it ten minutes, and that these gentlemen have the time.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I will modify my request so as to fix the limit to ten minutes. Therefore, I move that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.
The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.
Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment now.
The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few words upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Washington to the effect that the amendment, except for the quantity and volume of water, is already covered by the law and the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].
Mr. POINDEXTER. The gentleman is mistaken.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am sure I am not. The gentleman's amendment provides for the value of crops. That is in the law, as is also the acreage of the crops.
Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? The point is not the value of the crops raised upon the farms, but the value of the crops raised upon the irrigated land.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the provision of the law.
Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no provision in the law for that at all.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. The law provides for the value of crops on all lands that are irrigated, as well as other kinds, and the director is preparing blanks for that purpose, and every schedule will show, in the semiarid region, whether the land is irrigated land or not. If it is, it will give the value of the crop, the quantity of it, and everything except the provision about securing information respecting the quantity of water that may be used.
I submit that we have gone far enough upon the irrigation project, and for information that can be obtained from the Federal Government and from the state governments. I ask now for a vote.
Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question? I would like him to point out in the law any provision whereby the value of crops raised upon irrigated lands is to be had not commingled with those raised upon nonirrigated land, is provided outside of this amendment?
Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no such provision in relation to clay lands or sand lands or any other kind of lands, but there is specific information upon the subject of irrigation, and the schedules are prepared to find the area of irrigated lands in the country.
Mr. POINDEXTER. That was adopted this afternoon?
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Those provisions are already in the schedule.
Mr. POINDEXTER. In the schedule, but not in the law.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.
The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.
Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for a division.
The committee divided, and there were—ayes 28, noes 56.
Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.
The question was taken on ordering tellers.
The CHAIRMAN. Not a sufficient number; tellers are refused, and the amendment is rejected.
Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

That whoever, being a census enumerator, or other person employed in taking the Thirteenth Decennial Census of the United States, shall ask any question of any person of whom he is obtaining information respecting the census, as to his political affiliations or sentiments, or of the political affiliations or sentiments of others, or shall make known to anyone such information acquired by him in connection with his work as such census enumerator or other census employee, shall be fined not more than $1,000.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that I gave notice some time ago that I would offer, with one change, after consultation with Members on both sides of the Chamber; the change is striking out the imprisonment penalty. I do not desire to discuss this measure any further. It was fully discussed this morning. The reason for offering this amendment is well known to every Member of this House, and I am not going into it again. I want as much as anybody does a thoroughly nonpolitical and nonpartisan census taken. I do not want anybody to be employed in the taking of the census who shall gather the kind of information that my distinguished colleague from Missouri in his letter read this morning requested should be gathered and disseminated for the benefit of the Republican party. If the political parties of this country want to have a poll of the voters of this country, let the political parties of this country pay for that poll, and not take it out of the pockets of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us have a nonpartisan census in fact as well as name. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOOHER and Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 75.

Mr. BOOHER. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee's amendment as amended be now agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be now agreed to.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the census the enormous growth of the city of New York is of interest. Nothing connected with out city has grown more than our postal system, and I take pleasure, therefore, in presenting a review of it prepared by the postmaster of New York, Hon. E. M. Morgan, who has been thirty-eight years in the service, rising by merit from letter carrier to postmaster of the largest city in the Nation:

Address of Hon. Edward M. Morgan, postmaster of New York, at a meeting held on the evening of November 19, 1909, at 8 o'clock, at the Fourth Presbyterian Church, New York City.

TOPIC—"POSTAL SERVICE IN NEW YORK."

At our meeting of November 19, 1909, after the transaction of regular business, the president introduced the speaker as follows:

Postmaster Morgan represents our highest type of public official. He has come to us to-night to tell us something about the post-office and his work, of which we are every day beneficiaries. Having entered the employ as a carrier, he has risen, through faithful service, to be the head of that office, the largest in our country. His advancement speaks well for our civil service. It is my great pleasure to introduce to you Postmaster Morgan, whose topic will be "Postal Service in New York."

Mr. President, and gentlemen of the Fourth Presbyterian Church Brotherhood:

When Mr. Jones asked me to come and talk to you to-night he suggested that I speak for from a half to three-quarters of an hour. I fear I shall have difficulty in interesting you that long. I shall be obliged to refer at times to my notes, because it will be impossible to give you an adequate idea of the service without using figures, and large ones at that.

My talk to you to-night will be on the post-office and its business, and I know of no subject that should prove of greater interest, for the post-office comes in closer touch with our daily life than possibly any other institution, public or private. Between us and our friends, near and distant, it is a welcome link, and the visits of the letter carrier are looked forward to as expectantly to-day as in the olden time when, as a post rider, booted and spurred, he galloped along the highways.

Of our local post-office we are all more or less proud, and my talk will be confined to its phenomenal rise from the smallest of beginnings.

The post-office played but a minor part in the early affairs of New Amsterdam. For many years after the consummation of the greatest real estate deal on record, which secured from the Indians the whole island of Manhattan for $24, most of the slight correspondence that was carried on was forwarded in the care of chance travelers or mutual friends of the correspondents. Later, the necessity of some sort of receiving place was felt, and what was known as the "Coffee House Delivery" came into use, letters being addressed to some popular coffee house or tavern, where, upon receipt, they were "posted" in a conspicuous place in the public room, where they remained until chance or gossip regarding their arrival brought their owners to claim them.

That system in time came to be regarded as unsatisfactory, and in 1692, when New York, as it had then come to be called, was still a quiet village of about 5,000 inhabitants, the municipal authorities established an act or ordinance establishing a post-office. This was followed by the founding here, in 1710, of a "Chief Letter Office" by the postmaster-general of Great Britain. Shortly afterwards, arrangements were made for the delivery of mail from Boston twice a month, and propositions were advertised for the establishment of a post to Albany. The interesting feature of that advertisement, to us who are accustomed to the speedy locomotion of to-day, was that the mail was not to be carried by coach, or boat, or even on horseback, but on foot. Think of lingering at the breakfast table until the carrier arrived on foot from Albany with your morning mail!

The records are hazy as to the location of our first official post-office, but according to an advertisement that appeared in a paper of the period, it was removed in 1732 from the quarters it then occupied to "the uppermost of the two houses on Broadway, opposite Beaver street." The year 1753 found it still in the same location. It was closed on Sundays, and at other times it was open for business from 8 a. m. until noon, excepting on post nights, when business was transacted until 10 p. m.

In 1786, during the administration of Sebastian Bauman, the second postmaster after the close of the war of the Revolution, there was a regular schedule for the arrival and dispatch of mails between New York and Albany and New England, and also between New York and the South. Mail from New England and Albany arrived on Wednesday and Saturday in winter, and on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday in summer. The income of the office at that time was $2,789.84. It will require an effort to grasp the full meaning of the difference between that sum and the income for the twelve months ended September 30 of this year, when, for the first time in the history of our post-office, the receipts for any twelve consecutive months passed the twenty-million dollar mark, being exactly $20,451,172.53.

A reference to the post-office of that period would not be complete without some mention of Gen. Theodorus Bailey, who, besides having been a Congressman and a United States Senator, holds the record for length of service as postmaster, having served continuously from 1804 until his death in 1828. In the General's time there were altogether eight clerks, one of whom was Joe Dodd, afterwards known as Colonel Dodd, who became an employee of the office in 1816. That date brings us back practically to the beginning of things in the New York post-office; yet how really short the time is may be judged from the fact that it is spanned by less than two lifetimes, for there are many men still in the service who worked side by side with him, and when I was appointed in 1873 he was still a member of the working force.

Part of the colonel's duties in the earlier days was to ferry the southern mails over the Hudson from the Jersey shore, and then draw them in a wheelbarrow to that little post-office of which I have spoken, located in the uppermost of those two houses on Broadway opposite Beaver street—and small indeed it was, for it consisted of but one room, 15 feet long by 12 feet wide. He died in 1874, a year too soon to see his dearest wish fulfilled in the opening of the new post-office building in 1875.

The removal of the new building was attended with some show of ceremony, the employees marching in a body to their new home from the Old Dutch Church on Nassau street. Of that little band of marchers quite a number are still in harness, for, strange as it may seem, we have still with us in the service, remarkably active for his age, a man who has performed continuous service for sixty years; we have 4 men who have been doing duty for over fifty years, 45 for over forty years but less than fifty, and 157 for over thirty years but less than forty. We have, therefore, on our rolls to-day 207 men who, for a period extending from thirty to sixty years, at salaries in no case excessive and often inadequate, have performed faithful, conscientious, honest service; and now that the hand of time is beginning to press heavily upon the older of them it does seem a hardship that there is no provision in the way of a pension to help them in their declining years.

But I have wandered ahead of my story, which left us in the old office on Broadway, opposite Beaver street. In the summer of 1822, during an epidemic of yellow fever, a temporary move was made to what was then and still is known as "Bank street," but which at that time was away up in Greenwich village, then an outlying settlement separated from the town by a wide stretch of territory, mostly marsh and swamp. When the scare had subsided a return was made to the old quarters.

In 1825, a two-story frame building on Garden street, now known as Exchange place, formerly used as a schoolhouse, was leased for post-office purposes, and into it moved the eight clerks and six letter carriers who composed the entire staff. Another move was made two years later, when a lease was secured of the basement of the new exchange on Wall street, near Pearl. A fire destroyed the exchange in 1835, and after occupying quarters for a short time on Pine street, near Nassau, the post-office secured a new home in the building known as "The Rotunda," situated in City Hall Park. The New Yorkers of those days were of the opinion that the city would never grow far to the north, and the removal to City Hall Park raised such a storm of protest against having the post-office so far up town that finally it was decided to lease the Old Dutch Church on Nassau street, on the site of the present Mutual Life Insurance Building. This had been successively a church, a prison, a stable, and again a church, and it was turned into a post-office and remained so until the completion, in 1875, of the present post-office building at Broadway and Park row, the foundation stone of which was laid in 1869. Of the march of the employees from the old office to the new I have already spoken. The postmaster at that time was one of the ablest we have ever had. I refer to the Hon. Thomas L. James, who afterwards became Postmaster-General, and is now president of the Lincoln National Bank.

The new building, then one of the sights of the town because of its size and height, but now dwarfed by the immense sky-scraping structures surrounding it, did not long remain adequate for the purpose for which it was erected. As the city crept northward the business of the post-office followed, and branch after branch was established, until to-day, located at points best suited to the needs of the people, we have 42 branch post-offices and 251 substations, manned by a force of 7,511 employees, of whom 4,118 are clerks, 2,471 are letter carriers, 282 are laborers, 459 are substitute carriers, 181 are substitute clerks. This large force of men is apportioned among the general post-office and the 42 branches to which I have referred, and one of the most important tasks that falls upon the supervisory officials is the duty of seeing to it that the sanitary conditions in all of these places are as they should be. Post-office clerks, like other men, are influenced to a large extent by their environment, and it has been my experience that where the work is performed in a well-lighted and properly ventilated office, with clean closets and accessories, much better results are obtained than when the work is done in insanitary and unsavory quarters.

From the very beginning the main office was unsuited for the uses to which it had to be put, and it must be admitted that in many of the older stations there was much room for improvement in the matter of light and sanitation. Gradually, however, all this is being changed, and as the old leases expire and new quarters have to be secured these questions receive first consideration. In order that you might see the men at work under these newer and better conditions, I would like, if it were possible, to take you all down with me to the Hudson Terminal Station, with its 30,000 square feet of well-lighted, well-aired floor space, or up to the new Station M on Washington Heights, where a building erected expressly for post-office purposes supplies all the conveniences that the most exacting might desire.

Of this large force of over 7,500 men, scattered as they are throughout the city, all are doing their share in handling the more than a billion pieces of mail that are delivered in this city each year. I fancy that I can see some incredulous eyebrows raised at the mention of the word "billion," but it is in no wise an exaggeration, for in the last fiscal year the pieces of mail delivered here amounted to 1,095,882,050. These, please remember, are only the pieces of mail delivered in the city, or rather in the two boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx, which comprise the territory of the New York post-office, and do not include the mail deposited here for dispatch to other parts of the world, the total of which was even greater, being, for the same period, 1,314,860,396. So it will be seen that we handle in our post-office each year over 2,400,000,000 pieces of mail, or more than enough, placed end to end and figuring each piece as eight inches long, to reach from here to the moon.

Each one of these letters or packages must be handled separately by several employees at the offices of origin and address, as well as, in the majority of cases, by the railway mail and sea post clerks in the course of transportation, and the very small loss that occurs annually through depredations speaks well for the honesty and faithfulness of the entire post-office force.

It will be interesting here to follow one of those letters on its outward journey from New York and see how fast it travels as compared with the rate of speed a century ago. Let us suppose that a member of this congregation is corresponding with, well, his sister in Seattle. He has an office in the Bowling Green Building, and at half past 7 o'clock on Monday evening, from the fourteenth floor, he drops a letter into one of those brass-bound, glass-paneled mailing chutes that are now installed in most of our large buildings. In a twinkling the letter is in the chute box on the ground floor, and from there it is taken by a collector and deposited in Station P, with a load of other letters, at 8 o'clock. At the station it helps to form a pyramid of mail on a large table, where a corps of nimble-fingered clerks perform the process of "facing," which consists of arranging the letters address side up. When this is done they are ready for the canceling machine, an electric device which performs the double duty of postmarking the envelope and canceling the stamp at the rate of 30,000 pieces an hour. And here I wish to inject a word of caution. There is only one proper place for the postage stamp, and that is in the upper right-hand corner of the address side. Many people, from eccentric or other motives, have the habit of placing the stamp in all sorts of positions—sometimes on the back, where it acts as a seal, and sometimes in one of the other corners on the face—anywhere but where it should be. Perhaps there would be less of this if it were generally known that it not only impedes the work of the clerks, but usually delays the forwarding of the letter, for a stamp so placed will not catch the canceling lines and the envelope to which it is attached must be cast aside to be canceled by the slow hand process after the letters that were properly stamped have been disposed of, and often after they are on their way to their destination.

But to get back to our letter. After leaving the canceling machine it is conveyed to one of the distributing cases, where a separating clerk, working with a speed and accuracy nothing short of marvelous, places it and others addressed to the same destination into a pigeonhole labeled "State of Washington and Alaska." Within a few minutes, time being up, the letters in the pigeonhole are tied in a bundle bearing the same label, and at 8.30 the bundle is dispatched through the pneumatic tube to Grand Central Station, where it arrives about ten minutes later. There the clerks are waiting for it. They take it from the tube and bring it to the pouching case, where it is placed in a pouch labeled "New York and Chicago R. P. O. No. 2," and is dispatched on the train leaving Grand Central Depot at 9.30. That train reaches Chicago at 8.20 the following evening, and an hour and thirty minutes later our letter has left Chicago and is on its way to the Far West. On the way to Chicago it remained undisturbed in the package, but after that city has been left behind the package is ripped open by the railway mail clerks and placed with the thousands of others that are destined for Seattle. It arrives in Seattle at half past 8 in the evening of the fourth day out from New York, and gets to the post-office a half hour later. It rests overnight in the office and is delivered to the addressee on the 7.30 delivery the following morning. This, it will be admitted, is a vast improvement on the service of a hundred years ago, when Seattle was not yet in existence and when the quickest and practically the only way to the Pacific was by sailing packet round Cape Horn.

For the great improvement in the transportation of letter mail in the larger cities, most of the credit must be given to the pneumatic tube. There are over 20 miles of these tubes in operation in the territory of our post-office, branching out from the general office and making a complete circuit of the stations as far north as One hundred and twenty-fifth street, with cross-town connections at that street and also at Forty-second street.

Other factors which contribute to a quick delivery are the sea post and mail-boat services in connection with foreign mail, and also the evening-delivery service, inaugurated two years ago, under which people living in what are known as the "residential districts" may receive their mail at a late hour in the evening. The sea post service makes it possible for the mail to be assorted to a large extent during the voyage, thus obviating a great deal of that work at the office of delivery.

The mail-boat service has two speedy vessels under charter for the unloading of mail from ocean steamers. Very often, as you know, the steamers suffer a long detention at quarantine, after which they have to be towed slowly up the river and nosed into their docks with a great deal of maneuvering. All this consumes a lot of time, and it is to save this time that the mail boats are brought into requisition. They meet the steamers at quarantine, unload the mail, and hurry at full speed to the dock, often beating the steamers up the river by several hours. Of just how this service, helped out by the pneumatic tube and the evening delivery, works to the benefit of the citizen will be best understood by the following illustration:

One of the mail-carrying liners leaves Liverpool on a Saturday morning, bearing among its stock of mail a letter addressed to a citizen residing in the West Eighties. When the vessel arrives within hailing distance of our coast, as far east as Nantucket, that fact, to the hour and minute of sighting, is reported to the office of the postmaster, who is also kept informed of its further progress and is thus able to determine when it will arrive at quarantine. The squad of clerks assigned to the mail-boat service are ready for the word, and when it is given they go to the Cortlandt street dock and board the boat for quarantine, reaching there a short time before the arrival of the steamer. In the case we are describing, the two boats meet at quarantine at 2.30 p. m. on the Friday following the departure from Liverpool. The mails, consisting, it may be, of as many as 4,000 sacks (on the Majestic, arriving December 17, 1907, there were 4,968 of them) are slid down a chute from the steamer to the deck of the mail boat, and as soon as the first few sacks have been transferred the clerks begin the task of arranging them in separate piles according to the destination as shown on the labels. This work of separation is completed by the time the boat reaches the dock. We are all familiar with the old story about the "soft snap" enjoyed by the government clerk, but if the department rules permitted you to go down the bay on one of the mail boats and watch a squad of those government "clerks," attired in shirt and overalls and hustling as few longshoremen ever hustle, your opinion regarding the "snap" would be modified to the extent at least of omitting a post-office clerkship from the list of easy berths.

The mail is unloaded at the dock and dispatched to various points for transportation to ultimate destination. The letter we have in mind is addressed for delivery on the middle west side, and it, with other city mail, is driven to the general post-office, where it is sorted by an expert on the city scheme and forwarded by tube to Station W. From there, after having been sorted to the carrier's route, which includes the addressee's street and number, it is taken out by the carrier assigned to the evening delivery and delivered that night. If it is an important letter, requiring an immediate answer, the addressee can reply to it at once, and if he mail the answer in a street letter box before 10.50 p. m. it will go out on one of the mail steamers sailing the following morning.

The time of arrival shows that the letter we have had in mind was mailed on one of the slower steamers, and if it had come on one of the faster of the present-day boats still better time would have been made. The Mauretania, for instance, sailed from Liverpool at noon on September 25 last. She arrived at this port and left quarantine for her dock at 2.25 p. m. on September 30. Being a Cunard Line ship, she was not equipped with a sea post-office, the consequence being that the city mail that she carried was not made up in transit and had to be separated after arriving at our office. It reached the office at 6.31 p. m., and, notwithstanding the fact that the separation had to be made as stated, the letters addressed for delivery in the residential districts arrived at their stations by pneumatic tube in time to be taken out on the 8 o'clock delivery that night—just five days and eight hours after the departure of the ship from Liverpool. Mail arriving on her for, let us say, Buffalo, and received in direct pouches made up at Liverpool, was dispatched to the destination on the 9.30 p. m. train over the New York Central, arriving in Buffalo at 8.05 the following morning. Mail received in similar pouches for Pittsburg went out on the 8.44 train over the Pennsylvania Railroad and arrived in Pittsburg at 8 o'clock next morning, having been delivered, as was the Buffalo mail, in the forenoon of the same day.

Thus we see how all these inventions and innovations cooperate so wonderfully in curtailing the time between the posting and the delivery of foreign mail. Other inventions will follow, and it is not beyond range of probability that we may yet be able to drop our letter in a receptacle on any street corner and have it instantly whisked away by compressed air to the nearest post-office station.

We all know, of course, that New York is far in the lead of all other American cities, not only in population but also in the volume of business transacted, but how many of us realize that she does a bigger postal business, in the number of pounds of mail handled, than the cities of Chicago and Philadelphia combined, and that she all but equals the postal business of 21 of our States and Territories. Yet so it is, for an official weighing of the mails, made about two years ago and extending over a period of six months, demonstrated beyond question that the volume of mail handled at the New York post-office was close to the total of the mail handled by the following States and Territories taken together: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Nevada, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, and West Virginia. For the benefit of those good people who must be "shown," whether they come from Missouri or elsewhere, I will give the figures of the weighings: The New York post-office for the period mentioned handled 101,051,766 pounds of mail; Chicago and Philadelphia combined handled 98,325,115 pounds, and the States and Territories of which I have spoken handled 102,296,001 pounds.

In connection with the money-order business the figures are even more astounding. In 1875 the New York post-office had 770,486 money-order transactions, with a total cash value of $35,166,361.25. In 1890 the number of money-order transactions had jumped to 3,322,281, representing a cash value of $101,334,178.28; while during the fiscal year ended on June 30 of this year the transactions reached the enormous total of 11,303,299, the value being $423,543,790.14. Even the sum last mentioned does not represent high-water mark, for in the previous year—the fiscal year preceding the panic—the half-billion mark was passed, the total value being $526,304,437.44. This drop of over $100,000,000 shows that the panic, affecting at first only the capitalists, sifted down through all the intermediate stages of wealth until it hit the people of small means, for it is this class that makes most use of the money-order system, and it was to a falling off in their patronage that the shrinkage referred to was due.

But perhaps the great advance in New York's postal business can best be shown by a comparison of the business transacted in the registry division. The periods that I have chosen as a basis of comparison are the fiscal years ended June 30, 1899, and June 30, 1909, and for convenience we will call them "1899" and "1909."

In 1899 the pieces of registered mail received and delivered in New York amounted to 1,868,761, while in 1909 the number was 3,912,334. The number of registered articles received at the New York post-office for distribution in 1899 amounted to 1,197,274, while in 1909 the number was 3,974,463. The number of registered pieces mailed at the general post-office and stations in 1899 was 1,363,378, while in 1909 the number was 4,346,177. Thus we see that in the total number of registered pieces handled there was a jump from 4,429,419 in 1899 to 12,232,974 in 1909, showing that in ten years the registry business has almost been trebled.

And so it goes. There seems to be no end to our growth, and I have no doubt that some future postmaster, taking pride in a postal business that caters to a population of 10,000,000, will refer with complacency to our $20,000,000 business of to-day.

In connection with all that I have said, it is well to remember that the New York post-office does not serve all of the city of New York, but only the two boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx, there being separate post-offices in Brooklyn, Long Island City, and other former independent municipalities that are now included in the greater city.

And now, before I close, I wish to say a word on a subject that unfortunately seems to be inseparable from the post-office, and that is the subject of deficit. All of you, I am sure, have heard or read of criticism against the Post-Office Department because the service has not been placed and maintained on a paying basis. All of this criticism would cease if it were borne in mind that the post-office never was intended to be a money-making branch of the Government, and that it was and should be regarded primarily as a means of convenience to the public. This has been shown in many ways. Just as soon as revenue is about to catch up with expense, the service is loaded with some costly but beneficial innovation, as, for instance, the now indispensable rural free-delivery service, which is such a boon to the farmers. The rate of letter postage has been gradually reduced until it is now almost nominal. Solely in the interest of education, newspapers and periodicals that comply with certain rules are delivered at the rate of a cent a pound, although the actual cost of carriage is many times greater. Freight and express companies, which are conducted for revenue only, arrange the rate according to the distance, but the post-office, working solely in the interest of the public, has the same flat rate for all distances, the cost of mailing a letter being only 2 cents, whether the destination be South Ferry or the Philippines. The relation which this flat rate bears to the postal revenues will be understood when I state that of the first lot of mail sent to Circle City, Alaska, the average cost of each letter was $450, although the only cost to the sender was the price of a 2-cent stamp.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18364) to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved July 2, 1909, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to report back immediately with the following amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to recommit the bill with the following instructions: That the committee do report the bill forthwith with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whoever, being a census enumerator, or other person employed in taking the Thirteenth Decennial Census of the United States, shall ask any question of any person of whom he is obtaining information respecting the census as to his political affiliations or sentiments, or of the political affiliations or sentiments of others, or shall make known to anyone such information acquired by him in connection with his work as such census enumerator or other census employee, shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than one year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion to recommit on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that that is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair that the motion to lay on the table a motion to recommit is not in order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CLARK, the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 118, nays 150, answered "present" 10, not voting 109, as follows:

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. CARTER. I voted aye. I wish to withdraw my vote and vote present.

Mr. ANDRUS. Mr. Speaker, I voted aye, but I find that I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. RIORDAN], and I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded as present.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CRUMPACKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HAWLEY, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for two days on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Saugatuck Harbor and Kalamazoo River, Michigan (H. Doc. No. 635)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Aransas Pass Harbor, Texas (H. Doc. No. 639)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. Report of the Washington, Alexandria and Mount Vernon Railway Company for the year 1909 (H. Doc. No. 636)—to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a draft of proposed legislation to provide for care of the insane in Alaska (H. Doc. No. 637)—to the Committee on the Territories and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. MANN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18592) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at Kansas City, Mo., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 379), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. THISTLEWOOD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred sundry bills of the House, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 19959) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, accompanied by a report (No. 378), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17720) granting a pension to Emilie L. Kruger—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1910.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster-General submitting estimates of deficiency in the appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department, $34,000 (S. Doc. No. 348), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact filed by the court in the following causes:

Mrs. Mattie U. Boykin, Thaddeus C. Ferrell, and Mrs. Lula D. Meriwether, heirs of Thaddeus N. Ferrell, deceased, v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 344);

Francis L. Ward and Eliza C. Ward, administrators of Marjorie Ward, deceased, v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 345);

William H. Thompson, Ada A. Thompson, Michael D. Thompson, Andrew Thompson, and Jessie D. Thompson, heirs of William H. Stringer, deceased, v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 346); and

B. J. Cowart, administrator of the estate of Aaron Turner, deceased, v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 347).

The foregoing causes were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

CARE OF INSANE IN ALASKA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, by direction of the President, a draft of a bill to provide for the care of the insane in the Territory of Alaska, by authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to select a tract of public land and to erect and furnish suitable buildings thereon (H. Doc. No. 637), which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the communication just received from the Secretary of the Interior introducing into this body a bill proposing legislation. We on a former occasion had to deal with that question. I object to the reference of the bill, because it is not in conformity with any rule or privilege under the law or under the rules of this body.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. With the consent of the Senate, the reference is annulled, and the Chair will return the communication to the department.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho what is the rule or privilege that determines the matter?

Mr. HEYBURN. The rule or privilege that only members of the Senate of the United States may introduce measures for its consideration.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Do I understand that the Secretary of the Interior has undertaken to introduce a bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I will read the rule.

RULE XV.

1. All bills and joint resolutions which shall have received two readings shall first be considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, after which they shall be reported to the Senate.

There is a note to the rule, as follows:

NOTE.—Resolved, That no communications from heads of departments, commissioners, chiefs of bureaus, or other executive officers, except when authorized or required by law, or when made in response to a resolution of the Senate, will be received by the Senate unless such communications shall be transmitted to the Senate by the President. (Senate Journal, 1st sess. 60th Cong., p. 122.)

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator will permit me, what is the nature of the communication from the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a proposed bill. It comes to the Senate accompanied by a letter signed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the Secretary go so far as to introduce the bill into the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a question as to the effect of the presentation of the measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Chair may be indulged a moment, heretofore when such communications have come from departments the Chair has returned them to the departments and called attention to the rule. This letter of transmittal states, however, in its opening clause that the communication was sent by the direction of the President, and because of that the Chair submitted it to the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Constitution allows the President to communicate with Congress on matters of public interest. It does not allow him to delegate the power to any other persons. A bill introduced by a member of this body is subject to an objection, and the question is one of consent and not one of right. The proper motion or expression upon the presentation of a bill is that the member of this body asks consent to introduce the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill has not been introduced.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is its status, if I may ask, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is simply referred to the committee for its consideration as a part of a communication from a department of the Government, and is not introduced.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, no department of the Government is authorized to send messages to Congress. I object to its reference.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think the point is well taken by the Senator, and that he could go still further. The President of the United States, I will say in all courtesy, has no right to send a bill to this body to be referred to a committee. There is but one way in which a bill can get before a committee, and that is by its regular introduction by a Senator, and to send a bill to a committee from the Vice-President's desk is practically to introduce it. Of course if the committee charged with its consideration thinks right to report it back, when reported back it will take its place on the calendar, if reported favorably.

I think, Mr. President, it is time that this matter should be dealt with properly, and it is a very much graver matter than simply one of sending a communication by a head of a department in contravention of the rule which has been read by the Senator from Idaho. It is a very much graver undertaking to introduce a bill into the Senate in a way other than that which the law undoubtedly alone authorizes, and that is by a Senator.

Mr. President, the design of the framers of our Government was that the three departments should be separate. If there is anything that is well expressed and the intention left beyond the shadow of a doubt, it is that. The success of our system of government depends upon the maintenance of that clear division between the duties and powers of each department of the Government. It is entirely different in this particular from the English system of government, under which the executive functions are, in fact, exercised by a responsible ministry, accountable to the legislative department. Those ministers are themselves members of Parliament, and are, in effect, a committee of Parliament. For those ministers known as "the government" to send a bill to Parliament to be enacted into law is no breach of parliamentary prerogative.

It is necessarily apparent to everyone that there is a constant encroachment in this regard on the part of the executive department. I am not speaking of any particular Executive or of any particular administration, for it has been so for years under administrations by Democrats as well as by Republicans, and there is nothing partisan in what I say. There has been a constant and growing disposition on the part of the executive department for years past to dominate and control legislation and to dictate its enactment by the legislative branches of the Government.

Mr. President, we see in the papers every day now that certain policies are being formulated by the executive department into legislative bills, that the provisions are being considered by the executive department, and that not only in this administration but in former administrations parties who belong to no branch of the Government are being called in for a consultation as to what shall be embodied in bills thus to be enacted. If I recollect aright, even in this morning's papers there was an announcement of the fact that a bill which has been prepared by the executive department and is to be presented as a policy to be carried out had been framed and sent to the printer, and when it comes from the printer it is to be sent to Congress with a practical statement that it is to be enacted.

Of course, Mr. President, that is aside from the particular point we have in view. It is a great breach of the privilege of the Senate, in my opinion, a most radical violation of the constitutional powers and prerogatives of the Senate, for the executive department to send a bill to the Senate in a communication, the design of which is that it shall in that way be introduced and enacted into law.

I understand, Mr. President, that the Chair has annulled the order, and there is nothing further to be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not yet done so. The Chair was about to say that if there is no objection, the reference would be annulled, and the Chair will return the communication to the department with a reference to the rule which it is alleged was infracted.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, before this incident closes I would be glad to know from whom this communication comes and how it is addressed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication is addressed to the President of the Senate and it is signed by the Secretary of the Interior. In the opening sentence of his letter he states that by direction of the President the communication is sent.

As the Chair stated a few moments ago, when such communications have come heretofore the Chair has returned them to the persons sending the communication, calling attention to the Senate rule, and has invariably received back a very courteous answer, thanking the Vice-President for calling attention to the rule. That will be done in this case.

Mr. MONEY. There would not seem to be anything to object to if it did not include something else. Is there anything else besides?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. I say so far as the statement of the Chair is concerned there can be no objection to receiving the communication from the head of a department, but does it include anything else besides the communication that causes the point of order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication contains the draft of a proposed bill.

Mr. MONEY. I still do not understand how the department could send a bill to the Senate to be introduced unless through a member. Is it a proposition from the Secretary of the Interior to have the bill introduced and referred through some Senator or upon his own motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not read the communication in full. The Chair is unaware just exactly what the proposition is. The Chair simply read the opening sentence, and seeing that it was sent by direction of the President he laid it before the Senate rather than return it, which has been the custom of the Chair when such communications have been received other than from the President.

Mr. MONEY. The reason why I made this inquiry is because if there is no intention on the part of the Secretary to have the bill introduced here on his own motion there is no object to be met in the point of order. If there is, it is so obviously improper that notice of it will have to be taken as a matter of course. But I do not yet understand that the Secretary of the Interior or the President has attempted to introduce a bill for reference through any other than the ordinary channels of sending it to some Senator for his action and approval, to be introduced either by request or on his own responsibility.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the Chair read the opening clause of the communication to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MONEY. I simply want to understand whether the Secretary of the Interior proposes to introduce a bill or whether he was simply sending a bill here for someone else to introduce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair assumes that the Secretary of the Interior understood that somebody would introduce the bill. The opening sentence is—

By direction of the President I have the honor to submit draft of a bill to provide for the care of the insane in the Territory of Alaska—

And so forth.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. MONEY. I do not understand, if I may be allowed a moment, that this is an attempt of the Secretary to introduce a bill at all. He sends it to the Chair. The Chair is to do with the bill whatever he chooses. I suppose it is usual for the Chair to hand it to some member of the Senate and ask him to introduce it on his responsibility or by request. If that is the attitude, there is no complaint to be made, as I understand it, and there can be no objection to it; but if it is an attempt to introduce a bill, then of course the objection made by the Senator from Idaho is very proper and timely.

Mr. HEYBURN. Had not the communication better be read in full, in order that the whole question may appear in the RECORD and point all the objection? I ask that the communication be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 29, 1910.

The President of the Senate.

SIR: By direction of the President, I have the honor to submit draft of a bill to provide for the care of the insane in the Territory of Alaska by authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to select a tract of public land and erect and furnish suitable buildings thereon.

Under the provisions of the act of April 28, 1904 (33 Stats., 526), persons legally adjudged insane in Alaska have been cared for in a sanitarium at Mount Tabor, Portland, Oreg., at an expense of $348 per annum per patient. Under act of February 6, 1909 (35 Stats., 601), after due advertisement, another contract was entered into with the owner of the said sanitarium to care for the insane for five years from and after January 16, 1910, at the rate of $330 per annum per patient. This contract is, however, subject to cancellation at the expiration of two years from the date thereof. It is believed that the insane of Alaska should be cared for at some point within the Territory and at an institution provided by the Government for that purpose. The selection of a tract of public land as a site for the buildings and for hospital uses will obviate the expenditure of money for the purchase of land and confine the expense to the erection, furnishing, and maintenance of the buildings.

Very respectfully, R. A. BALLINGER, Secretary.

A bill to provide for the care and support of insane persons in the district of Alaska.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to select and reserve not exceeding 1,280 acres of public lands in the district of Alaska for hospital uses and as a site for buildings to be devoted to the care, maintenance, and treatment of persons legally adjudged insane in that district, and to cause to be erected thereon suitable buildings for such purpose, and to properly furnish the same, and the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for carrying the purposes of this act into effect.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would have it distinctly understood that it is in no sort of captiousness that I made the objection to the reference of this communication, but having in mind——

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. In just a moment. I want to finish my sentence. I had it in mind that at a comparatively recent date we considered this matter, and by a resolution, intended to settle this question, provided that no communication should be received from the head of a department by this body except it came through the President. This is the reverse, in a way, of that proposition. The communication of the President comes through the head of a department. Now, I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BRADLEY. What is the number of the rule to which the Senator refers?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is Rule XV. It is only in the interest, Mr. President, of orderly procedure and a proper recognition of the law of the land and the rules of this body that I felt impelled to make this objection, and I do not desire to be placed in the position of one who is criticising through a spirit of antagonism or animosity, but only as one who has regard for the rules of this body.

Now, in this connection I desire that there shall appear in the RECORD Rule XV and the resolution of the Sixtieth Congress on this question. I will read them in the RECORD in connection with the objection, stating first that I object to the receiving of this document because it is in direct violation of a resolution passed at the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, which reads:

Resolved, That no communications from heads of departments, commissioners, chiefs of bureaus, or other executive officers, except when authorized or required by law, or when made in response to a resolution of the Senate, will be received by the Senate unless such communications shall be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

This is clearly in violation of that rule.

Now I desire to call attention to the constitutional provision under which the President may communicate with this body. Section 3 of Article II of the Constitution provides, in defining the rights and duties of the President, as follows:

SEC. 3. He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may on extraordinary occasions convene both Houses—

And so forth.

I have read so much of it as pertains to this communication. It does not come under any of those rules and is under the prohibition of all of them.

I repeat, in connection with it, that it is out of no spirit of antagonism toward the department or toward the Executive that I make this objection, but merely because it should be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 18364. An act to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved July 2, 1909;

H. R. 18403. An act to repeal a portion of section 429 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

H. R. 18813. An act to amend section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894 (28 Stats., p. 567).

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 5236. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 19548. An act prescribing certain provisions and conditions under which bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States may be issued, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted by U. S. Grant Post, No. 327, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, of Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the enactment of a law directing Gen. F. D. Grant to be enrolled as a soldier of the civil war, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM presented memorials of sundry citizens of Sterling, New Berlin, Greenville, National City, Edwardsville, Worden, and Ridgeway, all in the State of Illinois, and of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OVERMAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Wendell, N. C., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Slocomb, Ala., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURKETT presented a petition of Sovereign Camp, Modern Woodmen of the World, of Omaha, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the admission to the mails of fraternal publications on the same basis as newspapers and magazines, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PRICES AND WAGES.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred Senate resolution No. 163 submitted by him yesterday for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the cost of food products in the United States, reported it favorably with amendments, and moved that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; which was agreed to.

ELIZABETH G. MARTIN.

Mr. DAVIS. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3082) for the relief of Elizabeth G. Martin, to report it with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 168) thereon. The bill has the unanimous indorsement of the committee, it is a trivial affair, and I ask the Senate for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $20,000, for the aid and support of Elizabeth G. Martin, widow of James P. Martin, who lost his life as the result of injuries received on the 6th day of April, 1906, by being run over by an engine of the Isthmian Canal Commission at Paraiso, belonging to the United States, being operated on the Panama Railroad at Paraiso, in the Canal Zone, be hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be paid to the said Elizabeth G. Martin by the Secretary of the Treasury immediately upon the approval of this act.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill has been amended so as to reduce the amount to $5,000.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Arkansas the reason of this bill. Have not the canal commission at the present time the power to adjust all these claims?

Mr. DAVIS. The committee considered that question. If the Secretary will be kind enough to read the report of the committee, it will be shown that it is a clear case of liability against the Government. The committee did not recommend the payment of $20,000, but of $5,000, and it is the unanimous report of the committee. This is a very just claim. The claimant is a poor woman, dependent absolutely upon her own resources, and her husband was killed while in the discharge of public official duties.

Mr. KEAN. But my point is that this is a claim, if there is a claim, against the canal commission at Panama, and it can be settled out of that fund and not by an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; upon an investigation the committee thought otherwise.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas to let the bill go to the calendar and we will have time to examine it. The calendar will be up almost any day and the bill will be reached in regular order.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the consideration of the bill. If the Secretary will be kind enough to read the report of the committee, I am certain it can be disposed of at once.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Utah to object?

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar.

JAMES L. BRADFORD.

Mr. McENERY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1232) for the relief of James L. Bradford, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 169) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill first be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill in full.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for present consideration?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask if there is a preamble to the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a preamble, and the committee report to strike out the preamble.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the preamble is stricken out, it seems to me that the text of the bill will not be proper. The bill recites that "said James L. Bradford." It looks to me as though the bill will have to be recast, if the preamble goes out, and the preamble ought to go out, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object to its present consideration?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the bill had better lie over for the purpose of making those changes. I do not object to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

COMMITTEE ON CIVIL SERVICE AND RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. ALDRICH. I submit a privileged resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment shall hereafter consist of eleven members, as follows: Messrs. CUMMINS, chairman; PERKINS, LA FOLLETTE, LODGE, SMOOT, BORAH, DIXON, CLARKE of Arkansas, RAYNER, OWEN, and JOHNSTON; and that Mr. CUMMINS be appointed to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Patents.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BURKETT:

A bill (S. 6074) to regulate the hours of labor on contracts with the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. 6075) granting an increase of pension to William M. Thomas (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DU PONT:

A bill (S. 6076) for the relief of the heirs of the late John W. Massey; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HALE:

PRICE OF FOOD PRODUCTS ON THE FARM.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the other day I introduced a resolution (S. Res. 154) concerning the investigation of the price of food products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. There have been a number of similar resolutions introduced, and one, very lately introduced, covering the same subject-matter, which has been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I ask that the resolution introduced by me, and to which I have referred, be referred to the same committee, in order that all these resolutions may be considered by that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is discharged from the further consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and the resolution is referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has said about the resolution he introduced a few days since and had referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I desire to ask whether this morning the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who is chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, has reported, as I inferred he would do, from what he said yesterday, the resolution introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] on the 5th day of January, just a month ago, which was referred to the committee presided over by the Senator from New Jersey? May I ask whether that resolution has been reported this morning?

Mr. KEAN. It has not been.

Mr. STONE. Well, does the Senator have any idea when it will be reported?

Mr. KEAN. The "Senator from New Jersey" thinks it will probably be considered and reported at a very early date. I have three such resolutions at the present time.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from New Jersey, as I understand from some observations which have been made to me, is practically the whole committee. I think the committee has very few, if any, meetings. The Senator meets in his committee room, does the business, and makes the reports. I have no objection to that, except it seems to me that where the work of the committee is done substantially by the chairman he ought not to require more than a month to report a resolution one way or the other. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if his committee—if he cares to answer it—has been called together to consider this resolution?

Mr. KEAN. I can not answer directly the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri, but I think the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is in session all the time. I notice that there are always vouchers to be signed and some work to be done, and I repeat the committee is always in session.

Mr. STONE. It looks, Mr. President, just a little bit as if there were a disposition to sidetrack or to suppress this resolution. It ought to be brought to the Senate.

Mr. ELKINS. I think I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to say that this morning there was reported a resolution covering this subject, substantially the same as the one introduced by myself.

Mr. STONE. I did not say so; nor was I aware that any such resolution had been reported.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought the Senator from Missouri said that; and I was about to answer the Senator and tell him that the resolutions are very different. The one reported by the Finance Committee is not the same in substance, nor in form, as the resolution I introduced. The resolution I introduced goes much further; and I want to read to the Senate in what particulars the resolution I introduced differs from the one introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], covering these questions, and on which the Finance Committee can report overnight, but the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate can not report in thirty days, and now refuses to report it to the Senate. Why this difference in treatment of Senators, this discrimination in favor of a resolution introduced by one Senator and against one introduced by another, both covering the same subject?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I have tried in the brief time that I have been in the Senate to follow the example at times set by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I believe that the resolution reported this morning by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] omits some very material things which ought to be covered in the consideration of this question. I shall not read all of the resolution which I introduced, but that part which is not incorporated in the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts:

If, in the judgment of said committee, such articles have been increased in price by reason of the increased production of gold throughout the world, the expansion of the currency in the United States, or by legislation by Congress.

That means the tariff. Why do the Finance Committee and the Senator from Massachusetts want to avoid that question? There are a great many people who think the tariff increases the cost of living. I am a tariff man and a protectionist, and I am not afraid to meet that question and be frank with the American people, moved as never before on an economic question.

More than that, Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit me, I ask him—for I came into the Chamber after the present order of business was taken up—whether a resolution such as he indicated was reported this morning?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. STONE. By whom?

Mr. ELKINS. From the Committee on Finance, by the Senator who introduced the resolution yesterday, being a member of that committee. It was introduced yesterday and reported this morning. It looks to me as though that committee worked quicker than the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. One in thirty days and the other in thirty hours.

Mr. LODGE. The Committee on Finance is a larger committee.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I want to read the remainder of this resolution. It does not take long when the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] arrives at the scene of action to look after certain things affected by the recent tariff, the passage of which through the Senate he secured as he wished and almost alone.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution which I introduced yesterday, and which I reported from the Committee on Finance this morning, as amended by the Finance Committee, covers the entire question of foreign importations and the tariff. I merely mention that. It does not do it at quite such great length as the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], but it is all there.

Mr. ELKINS. I fail to find anything about the tariff possibly being one of the causes of the high cost of living in his resolution.

Mr. LODGE. The reason the Senator from West Virginia has not found it is because he has not read the amended resolution.

Mr. ELKINS. I want to say further to the Senate that I had begun to reach the painful conclusion that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Finance Committee wanted to avoid the question of the tariff and other questions raised by my resolution.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will say the majority of the Finance Committee.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me one word on that point——

Mr. ELKINS. It was gotten through overnight and reported this morning.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me one moment. I made a speech here the other day devoted exclusively to that subject—the effect of the tariff on wages and prices. So certainly I show no disposition to avoid the question.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, the Senator made a very able speech on my resolution last Friday—said it was important and should be reported. Now, why did he change his mind and introduce a like resolution covering the same subject? I knew the Senator would claim that there was no disposition to avoid the tariff and other questions as contributory causes, but the press of the country says there is such a disposition.

Mr. BAILEY. Which does the Senator from West Virginia believe—the press or the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ELKINS. I suspend pronouncing judgment just at present. [Laughter.] I want to hear more of the performances of the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator is an able member, and also from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, before reaching conclusions. It may be that this was referred to the committee of which my amiable friend from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] is chairman, in order that it might sleep the sleep of death and avoid any investigation whatever. I for one, as a Republican, want to meet the question squarely, locate the difficulty, and ascertain the contributory causes of the high cost of living, and I introduced a resolution thirty days ago—on January 5—for this very purpose.

Mr. LODGE. That is not thirty days ago.

Mr. STONE. How did it happen that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts did not go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate as well as the one introduced by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. It has gone there.
